PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The auspicious circumstances under which you will commence the duties of the present session will lighten the burdens inseparable from the high trust committed to you. The fruits of the earth have been unusually abundant; commerce has flourished; the revenue has exceeded the most favorable anticipation, and peace and amity are preserved with foreign nations on conditions just and honorable to our country. For these inestimable blessings we cannot but be grateful to that Providence which watches over the destiny of nations.

As the term limited for the operation of the commercial convention with Great Britain will expire early in the month of July next, and it was deemed important that there should be no interval, during which that portion of our commerce, which was provided for by that convention, should not be regulated, either by arrangements between the two Governments, or by the authority of Congress, the Minister of the United States at London was instructed, early in the last Summer, to invite the attention of the British Government to the subject, with a view to that object. He was instructed to propose, also, that the negotiation which it was wished to open, might extend to the general commerce of the two countries, and to every other interest and unsettled difference between them; particularly those relating to impressment, the fisheries, and boundaries, in the hope that an arrangement might be made, on principles of reciprocal advantage, which might comprehend and provide, in a satisfactory manner, for all these high concerns. I have the satisfaction to state, that the proposal was received by the British Government in the spirit which prompted it, and that a negotiation has been opened at London embracing all these objects. On full consideration of the great extent and magnitude of the trust, it was thought proper to commit it to not less than two of our distinguished citizens, and, in consequence, the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris has been associated with our Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at London; to both of whom corresponding instructions have been given; and they are now engaged in the discharge of its duties. It is proper to add, that, to prevent any inconvenience resulting from the delay incident to a negotiation on so many important subjects, it was agreed, before entering on it, that the existing convention should be continued for a term not less than eight years.

Our relations with Spain remain nearly in the state in which they were at the close of the last session. The convention of 1802, providing for the adjustment of a certain portion of the claims of our citizens for injuries sustained by spoliation, and so long suspended by the Spanish Government, has at length been ratified by it; but no arrangement has yet been made for the payment of another portion of like claims, not less extensive or well founded, or for other classes of claims, or for the settlement of boundaries. These subjects have again been brought under consideration in both countries, but no agreement has been entered into respecting them. In the meantime events have occurred, which clearly prove the ill effect of the policy which that Government has so long pursued, on the friendly relations of the two countries, which, it is presumed, it is at least of as much importance to Spain, as to the United States, to maintain. A state of things has existed in the Floridas, the tendency of which has been obvious to all who have paid the slightest attention to the progress of affairs in that quarter. Throughout the whole of those provinces to which the Spanish title extends, the Government of Spain has scarcely been felt. Its authority has been confined almost exclusively to the walls of Pensacola and St. Augustine, within which only small garrisons have been maintained. Adventurers from every country, fugitives from justice, and absconding slaves, have found an asylum there. Several tribes of Indians, strong in the number of their warriors, remarkable for their ferocity, and whose settlements extend to our limits, inhabit those provinces. These different hordes of people, connected together, disregarding, on the one side, the authority of Spain, and protected, on the other, by an imaginary line, which separates Florida from the United States, have violated our laws prohibiting the introduction of slaves, have practised various frauds on our revenue, and committed every kind of outrage on our peaceable citizens, which their proximity to us enabled them to perpetrate. The invasion of Amelia Island, last year, by a small band of adventurers, not exceeding one hundred and fifty in number, who wrested it from the inconsiderable Spanish force stationed there and held it several months, during which, a single effort only was made to recover it, which failed, clearly proves how completely extinct the Spanish authority had become, as the conduct of those adventurers, while in possession of the island, as distinctly shows the pernicious purposes for which their combination had been formed.

This country had, in fact, become the theatre of every species of lawless adventure. With little population of its own, the Spanish authority almost extinct, and the colonial governments in a state of revolution, having no pretension to it, and sufficiently employed in their own concerns, it was in a great measure derelict, and the object of cupidity to every adventurer. A system of buccannery was rapidly organizing over it, which menaced, in its consequences, the lawful commerce of every nation, and particularly of the United States; while it presented a temptation to every people, on whose seduction its success principally depended. In regard to the United States, the pernicious effect of this unlawful combination was not confined to the ocean. The Indian tribes have constituted the effective force in Florida. With these tribes these adventurers had formed, at an early period, a connexion, with a view to avail themselves of that force, to promote their own projects of accumulation and aggrandizement. It is to the interference of some of these adventurers, in misrepresenting the claims and titles of the Indians to land, and in practising on their savage propensities, that the Seminole war is principally to be traced. Men who thus connect themselves with savage communities, and stimulate them to war, which is always attended, on their part, with acts of barbarity the most shocking, deserve to be viewed in a worse light than the savages. They would certainly have no claim to an immunity from the punishment, which, according to the rules of warfare practised by the savages, might justly be inflicted on the savages themselves.

If the embarrassments of Spain prevented her from making an indemnity to our citizens, for so long a time, from her treasury, for their losses by spoliation and otherwise, it was always in her power to have provided it, by the cession of this territory. Of this her Government has been repeatedly apprized, and the cession was the more to have been anticipated, as Spain must have known that, in ceding it, she would, in effect, cede what had become of little value to her, and would likewise relieve herself from the important obligation secured by the treaty of 1795, and all other commitments respecting it. If the United States, from consideration of these embarrassments, declined pressing their claims in a spirit of hostility, the motive ought, at least, to have been duly appreciated by the Government of Spain. It is well known to her Government that other Powers have made to the United States an indemnity for like losses sustained by their citizens at the same epoch.

There is, nevertheless, a limit, beyond which this spirit of amity and forbearance can in no instance be justified. If it was proper to rely on amicable negotiation for an indemnity of losses, it would not have been so to have permitted the inability of Spain to fulfil her engagements, and to sustain her authority in the Floridas, to be perverted, by foreign adventurers and savages, to purposes so destructive to the lives of our fellow-citizens, and the highest interests of the United States. The right of self-defence never ceases. It is among the most sacred, and alike necessary to nations and individuals. And, whether the attack be made by Spain herself, or by those who abuse her power, its obligation is not the less strong. The invaders of Amelia Island had assumed a popular and respected title, under which they might approach and wound us. As their object was distinctly seen, and the duty imposed on the Executive, by an existing law, was profoundly felt, that mask was not permitted to protect them. It was thought incumbent on the United States to suppress the establishment, and it was accordingly done. The combination in Florida, for the unlawful purposes stated, the acts perpetrated by that combination, and, above all, the incitement of the Indians, to massacre our fellow-citizens, of every age, and of both sexes, merited a like treatment, and received it. In pursuing these savages to an imaginary line, in the woods, it would have been the height of folly to have suffered that line to protect them. Had that been done, the war could never cease. Even if the territory had been, exclusively, that of Spain, and her power complete over it, we had a right, by the law of nations, to follow the enemy on it, and to subdue him there. But the territory belonged, in a certain sense, at least, to the savage enemy who inhabited it; the power of Spain had ceased to exist over it, and protection was sought, under her title, by those who had committed on our citizens hostilities which she was bound by treaty to have prevented, but had not the power to prevent. To have stopped at that line would have given new encouragement to these savages, and new vigor to the whole combination existing there, in the prosecution of all its pernicious purposes.

In suppressing the establishment at Amelia Island, no unfriendliness was manifested towards Spain, because the post was taken from a force which had wrested it from her. The measure, it is true, was not adopted in concert with the Spanish Government, or those in authority under it; because, in transactions connected with the war in which Spain and the colonies are engaged, it was thought proper, in doing justice to the United States, to maintain a strict impartiality towards both the belligerent parties, without consulting or acting in concert with either. It gives me pleasure to state, that the Governments of Buenos Ayres and Venezuela, whose names were assumed, have explicitly disclaimed all participation in those measures, and even the knowledge of them, until communicated by this Government, and have also expressed their satisfaction that a course of proceedings had been suppressed, which, if justly imputable to them, would dishonor their cause.

In authorizing Major General Jackson to enter Florida, in pursuit of the Seminoles, care was taken not to encroach on the rights of Spain. I regret to have to add, that, in executing this order, facts were disclosed respecting the conduct of the officers of Spain, in authority there, in encouraging the war, furnishing munitions of war, and other supplies, to carry it on, and in other acts, not less marked, which evinced their participation in the hostile purposes of that combination, and justified the confidence with which it inspired the savages, that, by those officers they would be protected. A conduct so incompatible with the friendly relations existing between the two countries, particularly with the positive obligation of the 5th article of the treaty of 1795, by which Spain was bound to restrain, even by force, those savages, from acts of hostility against the United States, could not fail to excite surprise. The Commanding General was convinced that he should fail in his object; that he should in effect accomplish nothing, if he did not deprive those savages of the resource on which they had calculated, and of the protection on which they had relied in making the war. As all the documents relating to this occurrence will be laid before Congress, it is not necessary to enter into further detail respecting it.

Although the reasons which induced Major General Jackson to take these posts were duly appreciated, there was, nevertheless, no hesitation in deciding on the course which it became the Government to pursue. As there was reason to believe that the commanders of these posts had violated their instructions, there was no disposition to impute to their Government a conduct so unprovoked and hostile. An order was in consequence issued to the General in command there to deliver the posts—Pensacola, unconditionally to any person duly authorized to receive it; and St. Marks, which is in the heart of the Indian country, on the arrival of a competent force, to defend it against those savages and their associates.

In entering Florida to suppress this combination, no idea was entertained of hostility to Spain, and, however justifiable the Commanding General was, in consequence of the misconduct of the Spanish officers, in entering St. Marks and Pensacola, to terminate it, by proving to the savages and their associates that they should not be protected even there; yet the amicable relations existing between the United States and Spain could not be altered by that act alone. By ordering the restitution of the posts, those relations were preserved. To a change of them the power of the Executive is deemed incompetent. It is vested in Congress only.

By this measure, so promptly taken, due respect was shown to the Government of Spain. The misconduct of her officers has not been imputed to her. She was enabled to review with candor her relations with the United States, and her own situation, particularly in respect to the territory in question, with the dangers inseparable from it; and, regarding the losses we have sustained, for which indemnity has been so long withheld, and the injuries we have suffered through that territory, and her means of redress, she was likewise enabled to take, with honor, the course best calculated to do justice to the United States, and to promote her own welfare.

Copies of the instructions to the Commanding General, of his correspondence with the Secretary of War, explaining his motives, and justifying his conduct, with a copy of the proceedings of the courts martial, in the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambrister; and of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Minister Plenipotentiary of Spain near this Government; and of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at Madrid, with the Government of Spain, will be laid before Congress.

The civil war, which has so long prevailed between Spain and the provinces in South America, still continues without any prospect of its speedy termination. The information respecting the condition of those countries, which has been collected by the Commissioners, recently returned from thence, will be laid before Congress, in copies of their reports, with such other information as has been received from other agents of the United States.

It appears, from these communications, that the Government of Buenos Ayres declared itself independent in July, 1816, having previously exercised the power of an independent Government, though in the name of the King of Spain, from the year 1810: that the Banda Oriental, Entre Rios, and Paraguay, with the city of Santa Fe, all of which are also independent, are unconnected with the present Government of Buenos Ayres: that Chili has declared itself independent, and is closely connected with Buenos Ayres; that Venezuela has also declared itself independent, and now maintains the conflict with various success; and that the remaining parts of South America, except Montevideo, and such other portions of the eastern bank of the La Plata as are held by Portugal, are still in the possession of Spain, or, in a certain degree, under her influence.

By a circular note addressed by the Ministers of Spain to the allied Powers with whom they are respectively accredited, it appears that the allies have undertaken to mediate between Spain and the South American provinces, and that the manner and extent of their interposition would be settled by a Congress, which was to have met at Aix-la-Chapelle in September last. From the general policy and course of proceeding observed by the allied Powers in regard to this contest, it is inferred that they will confine their interposition to the expression of their sentiments; abstaining from the application of force. I state this impression, that force will not be applied, with the greater satisfaction, because it is a course more consistent with justice, and likewise authorizes a hope that the calamities of the war will be confined to the parties only, and will be of shorter duration.

From the view taken of this subject, founded on all the information that we have been able to obtain, there is good cause to be satisfied with the course heretofore pursued by the United States, in regard to this contest, and to conclude, that it is proper to adhere to it, especially in the present state of affairs.

I have great satisfaction in stating, that our relations with France, Russia, and other Powers, continue on the most friendly basis.

In our domestic concerns we have ample cause of satisfaction. The receipts into the Treasury, during the three first quarters of the year, have exceeded seventeen millions of dollars.

After satisfying all the demands which have been made under existing appropriations, including the final extinction of the old six per cent. stock, and the redemption of a moiety of the Louisiana debt, it is estimated that there will remain in the Treasury, on the first day of January next, more than two millions of dollars.

It is ascertained that the gross revenue which has accrued from the customs during the same period amounts to twenty-one millions of dollars, and that the revenue of the whole year may be estimated at not less than twenty-six millions. The sale of the public lands during the year has also greatly exceeded, both in quantity and price, that of any former year; and there is just reason to expect a progressive improvement in that source of revenue.

It is gratifying to know, that, although the annual expenditure has been increased by the act of the last session of Congress, providing for Revolutionary pensions, to an amount about equal to the proceeds of the internal duties, which were then repealed, the revenue for the ensuing year will be proportionally augmented, and that, while the public expenditure will probably remain stationary, each successive year will add to the national resources, by the ordinary increase of our population, and by the gradual development of our latent sources of national prosperity.

The strict execution of the revenue laws, resulting principally from the salutary provisions of the act of the 20th of April last, amending the several collection laws, has, it is presumed, secured to domestic manufactures all the relief that can be derived from the duties, which have been imposed upon foreign merchandise, for their protection. Under the influence of this relief, several branches of this important national interest have assumed greater activity, and, although it is hoped that others will gradually revive, and ultimately triumph over every obstacle, yet the expediency of granting further protection is submitted to your consideration.

The measures of defence, authorized by existing laws, have been pursued with the zeal and activity due to so important an object, and with all the despatch practicable in so extensive and great an undertaking. The survey of our maritime and inland frontiers has been continued; and, at the points where it was decided to erect fortifications, the work has been commenced, and, in some instances, considerable progress has been made. In compliance with resolutions of the last session, the Board of Commissioners were directed to examine in a particular manner the parts of the coast therein designated, and to report their opinion of the most suitable sites for two naval depots. This work is in a train of execution. The opinion of the Board on this subject, with a plan of all the works necessary to a general system of defence, so far as it has been formed, will be laid before Congress, in a report from the proper department, as soon as it can be prepared.

In conformity with the appropriations of the last session, treaties have been formed with the Quapaw tribe of Indians, inhabiting the country on the Arkansas, and with the Great and Little Osages north of the White river; with the tribes in the State of Indiana; with the several tribes within the State of Ohio, and the Michigan Territory; and with the Chickasaws; by which very extensive cessions of territory have been made to the United States. Negotiations are now depending with the tribes in the Illinois Territory, and with the Choctaws, by which it is expected that other extensive cessions will be made. I take great interest in stating that the cessions already made, which are considered so important to the United States, have been obtained on conditions very satisfactory to the Indians.

With a view to the security of our inland frontiers, it has been thought expedient to establish strong posts at the mouth of Yellow Stone River, and at the Mandan village, on the Missouri; and at the mouth of St. Peters, on the Mississippi, at no great distance from our northern boundaries. It can hardly be presumed, while such posts are maintained in the rear of the Indian tribes, that they will venture to attack our peaceable inhabitants. A strong hope is entertained that this measure will likewise be productive of much good to the tribes themselves; especially in promoting the great object of their civilization. Experience has clearly demonstrated, that independent savage communities cannot long exist within the limits of a civilized population. The progress of the latter has, almost invariably, terminated in the extinction of the former, especially of the tribes belonging to our portion of this hemisphere, among whom, loftiness of sentiment, and gallantry in action, have been conspicuous. To civilize them, and even to prevent their extinction, it seems to be indispensable that their independence, as communities, should cease, and that the control of the United States over them should be complete and undisputed. The hunter state will then be more easily abandoned, and recourse will be had to the acquisition and culture of land, and to other pursuits tending to dissolve the ties which connect them together as a savage community, and to give a new character to every individual. I present this subject to the consideration of Congress, on the presumption that it may be found expedient and practicable to adopt some benevolent provisions, having these objects in view, relative to the tribes within our settlements.

It has been necessary, during the present year, to maintain a strong naval force in the Mediterranean, and in the Gulf of Mexico, and to send some public ships along the Southern coast, and to the Pacific Ocean. By these means, amicable relations with the Barbary Powers have been preserved, our commerce has been protected, and our rights respected. The augmentation of our Navy is advancing, with a steady progress, towards the limit contemplated by law.

I communicate, with great satisfaction, the accession of another State, Illinois, to our Union; because I perceive, from the proof afforded by the additions already made, the regular progress and sure consummation of a policy, of which history affords no example, and of which the good effect cannot be too highly estimated. By extending our Government, on the principles of our Constitution, over the vast territory within our limits, on the lakes and the Mississippi, and its numerous streams, new life and vigor are infused into every part of our system. By increasing the number of the States, the confidence of the State governments in their own security is increased, and their jealousy of the National Government proportionally diminished. The impracticability of one consolidated Government for this great and growing nation will be more apparent, and will be universally admitted. Incapable of exercising local authority, except for general purposes, the General Government will no longer be dreaded. In those cases of a local nature, and for all the great purposes for which it was instituted, its authority will be cherished. Each Government will acquire new force and a greater freedom of action, within its proper sphere. Other inestimable advantages will follow: our produce will be augmented to an incalculable amount, in articles of the greatest value for domestic use and foreign commerce. Our navigation will, in like degree be increased; and, as the shipping of the Atlantic States will be employed in the transportation of the vast produce of the Western country, even those parts of the United States, which are most remote from each other, will be further bound together by the strongest ties which mutual interest can create.

The situation of this District, it is thought, requires the attention of Congress. By the Constitution, the power of legislation is exclusively vested in the Congress of the United States. In the exercise of this power, in which the people have no participation, Congress legislate in all cases, directly on the local concerns of the District. As this is a departure, for a special purpose, from the general principles of our system, it may merit consideration, whether an arrangement better adapted to the principles of our Government, and to the particular interests of the people, may not be devised, which will neither infringe the Constitution, nor affect the object which the provision in question was intended to secure. The growing population, already considerable, and the increasing business of the District, which it is believed already interferes with the deliberations of Congress on great national concerns, furnish additional motives for recommending this subject to your consideration.

When we view the great blessings with which our country has been favored, those which we now enjoy, and the means which we possess of handing them down, unimpaired, to our latest posterity, our attention is irresistibly drawn to the source from whence they flow. Let us then unite in offering our most grateful acknowledgments for these blessings to the Divine Author of all Good.

SENATE.

Compensation to certain Officers.

NOVEMBER, 1818.

Mr. MACON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to cause a survey to be made of the shoals of Cape Hatteras, Cape Lookout, and the Frying Pans; and to have such an examination made of them respectively as will ascertain the practicability of erecting a light-house, lighted beacon, or buoy, on, or near the extreme points of them, or either of them.

COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

The bill to increase the compensation of certain officers of Government [the Secretaries of the Departments, the Attorney General, and Postmaster General] was taken up for consideration. Mr. BARRETT rose to offer a few remarks on the propriety of this bill, which he had introduced. He adverted to the proceedings on this subject at the last session, and observed, that, from all the information which had come before him then, he had thought an increase of one-third of the present compensation of those officers would be just and proper; a majority, however, had deemed an addition of twenty-five per cent. sufficient; in this opinion he had cheerfully acquiesced; and, at the proper time, when the blanks in the bill came to be filled, it was his intention to propose such an increase. It had been admitted, on all hands, Mr. B. said, that the salaries at present allowed to those officers were totally inadequate to their decent and comfortable support; the necessary and inevitable consequences of which, if the compensation was not increased, was, that none but men who possessed large fortunes and were willing to sacrifice them in the public service, could fill those offices, and the gentlemen who now filled must abandon them. It was contrary, he well knew, to the spirit of our institutions, to allow exorbitant salaries, but it was equally improper to deny what was just and reasonable—the true object was to find the medium between the two extremes, and such was his desire in the present proposition.

Mr. BURRILL moved to add to the bill a new section, embracing an increase of the salaries of the Chief Justice and Judges of the Supreme Court. He submitted it to the Senate whether the compensation of these officers did not also require increase; and, if so, whether it was not better and fairer to provide for it in the present bill. He remarked, further, that if gentlemen, as was probable, thought additional compensation due to the district judges also, an amendment to that effect could be likewise offered, and thus the whole subject be brought at once before Congress. Mr. BARRETT said that, as regarded the principle of the amendment, his opinion was testified by his vote in its favor at the last session; but he objected to associating that question with the proposition to increase the compensation of the heads of Departments, &c. The questions, he said, were perfectly distinct, and, if this amendment were admitted in the bill, other gentlemen could press the increase of the salaries of other officers, and, said Mr. B., we shall go on in a circle until the bill be so loaded with amendments as to sink under their weight. He thought it proper to decide the insulated question proposed by the bill: on this question there was, he believed, no doubt or difference of sentiment; on the other there might be doubts, and the copartnership proposed by the amendment might be fatal to the first proposition, and the individuals involved in it suffer injustice. If an increase of salary was proper for the judges, why not, he asked, present the proposition separately, when, if it was the will of Congress, the increase would be dispensed to them? But, if the present motion was here persisted in, the connexion might destroy that which all admitted to be necessary, and the public will be thus thwarted? But this was not the only objection, Mr. B. said. He adverted to the difficulties which had occurred from the presumed want of jurisdiction in the State courts to execute the laws of the Union, and the necessity which might make additional judges necessary fully to administer the laws in the States, if the State authorities went on denying their power to act under the laws of the Union: in this case the duties of the present judges would cease to be itinerant, their duties would be lightened, and their present compensation be deemed sufficient. Mr. B. made incidentally a few remarks, on the salutary effect of some such change in the constitution of the Judiciary Department, and concluded by repeating his desire that the proposition contained in the amendment might be kept distinct from the present bill.

Mr. BURRILL's motion was then negatived—yeas 9; and the bill ordered to be engrossed (in blanks) for a third reading.

Your committee, on this occasion, would observe, that, notwithstanding the facts set forth in the petition appear to be proven by numerous vouchers, it would be inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioner, inasmuch as the existing laws on the subject of pensions prescribe the mode of taking testimony, and every other prerequisite by which they may be obtained, in a full, ample, and it is conceived, liberal manner, and, to depart from those general rules and regulations, and to make each individual case a subject of legislative inquiry and enactment, would be extremely burdensome and inconvenient, and perhaps in some cases might subject the Government to im-

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from John Gardiner, presenting to the Senate maps of the Alabama Territory, and of the military bounty lands in the Missouri Territory; and the letter was read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, presented the petition of merchants, traders, and inhabitants of St. Stephens, in the Alabama Territory, praying to be made a port of entry; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. MORRIL presented the petition of David Stephens, of Ohio, praying the privilege of re-entering a certain quarter section of land for the original consideration; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of Solomon Provost, praying compensation for property taken for the use of the Army of the United States; the petition of Noel Destrahan, for and in behalf of the heirs of E. Macarty, praying indemnification for property destroyed during the late war; and also the petition of Peter Lacoste, praying indemnification for the loss of slaves, taken away by the British during the late war; and the petitions were respectively read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law, authorizing the President of the United States to take provisional possession of East Florida, or of such parts of it as he may deem essential, now or hereafter, to control the Indians, and to prevent them from committing hostilities against the citizens of the United States.

Mr. BURRILL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act concerning the western district court of Pennsylvania," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LACOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General John Stark," reported the same without amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the memorial of Matthew Lyon; and the consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The bill for the relief of Matthew Barrow was read the second time.

The bill further to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payment thereon, was read the second time.

The bill, introduced some days ago by Mr. DAGGETT, to extend the judicial system of the United States, was next taken up as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAGGETT rose in support of this bill, and, after observing that it was, with the exception of a few of its features, similar to the bill on the same subject before the House of Representatives at the last session, proceeded to explain briefly, but distinctly, its several provisions, showing the expediency of some and the absolute necessity of others. When Mr. D. concluded his remarks, the bill was, on his motion, referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, and the appointment of circuit judges; and Mr. BARBOUR having submitted a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions; on motion by Mr. ORIS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 4th instant, for the appointment of a joint committee, to consider and report, whether any further provisions by law are necessary, in relation to the printing done by order of Congress; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 4th instant, "That the Message of the President and documents relative to the Seminole war, be referred to a select committee, who shall have authority, if necessary, to send for persons and papers;" and, on motion by Mr. LACOCK, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 4th instant, "That no paper or document shall hereafter be printed, for the use of the Senate, but by special order, except messages from the President of the United States, or communications from the House of Representatives;" and agreed thereto.

The bill more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution to erect a monument over the remains of the late General GEORGE WASHINGTON, where they now lie; and, on motion by Mr. HANSON, the further consideration thereof was postponed until this day fortnight.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker; and, on motion by Mr. WILSON, the further consideration thereof was postponed until this day fortnight.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of John G. Brown; and in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Stephen Fuller; and in concurrence therewith, resolved that he have leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of James Wilde; and, on motion by Mr. WILSON, it was recommended to the Committee of Claims, further to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution, directing the survey of certain parts of the coast of North Carolina; and the same having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to establish a judicial district in Virginia, west of the Alleghany mountain;" and, on motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the further consideration thereof was postponed until this day fortnight.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DAGGETT communicated the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, which were read:

At a General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, held at Hartford, in said State, on the second Thursday of May, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

Resolved by this Assembly, That, for the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled. The districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants entitled by the Constitution to be represented. In each district the qualified voters shall elect one Representative, and no more. That for the purpose of appointing Electors for the President and Vice President of the United States, in each district entitled to elect a Representative in the Congress of the United States, the persons qualified to vote for Representatives, shall appoint one Elector, and no more. The additional two Electors to which each State is entitled, shall be appointed in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct. The Electors when convened, shall have power, in case any of them appointed as above prescribed, shall fail to attend for the purposes of their said appointment, on the day prescribed for giving their votes for President and Vice President of the United States, to appoint another, or others, to act in the place of him or them so failing to attend.

Neither the districts for choosing Representatives, nor those for appointing Electors, shall be altered in any State, until a census and apportionment of Representatives under it, subsequent to the division of the States into districts, shall be made. The division of States into districts, hereby provided for, shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted, and ratified as a part of the Constitution of the United States; and successively, immediately afterwards, whenever a census and apportionment of Representatives under it shall be made. The division of each State into districts, for the purpose both of choosing Representatives and of appointing Electors, shall be altered agreeably to the provisions of this amendment, and on no other occasion.

Resolved, That our Senators in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to endeavor to obtain the said amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor of this State be requested to forward a copy of the preceding resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and also to the Governors of the several States, with a request, that the same may be laid before their respective Legislatures, for their consideration and adoption.

cerns and transactions, and to lay them before the Senate; which was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 4, 1818.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 15th of April last, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to procure from the Bank of the United States sundry statements of its concerns and transactions, and to lay them before the Senate immediately after the commencement of the next session of Congress, I have the honor to submit the enclosed statements and communications made to this Department by that institution.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. JOHN GAILLARD,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 11, 1818.

SIR: The enclosed resolution is submitted to the president and directors of the Bank of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining the information required by it in time to be communicated to the Senate at the commencement of the next session of Congress. It is presumed that the statement required by the second member of the resolution may be furnished up to the 30th of September next.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

WILLIAM JONES, Esq.,
President of the Bank of the U. S.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES,
November 11, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the statements required by the resolution of the Senate of the 15th of April, a copy of which you were pleased to communicate in your letter of the 11th of June last.

The statements are numbered in the order of the several members of the resolution, and the details and accompanying remarks it is considered will render them perfectly intelligible.

In respect to the payments made on account of the cash part of the second and third instalments of the capital of the bank, it is impossible to designate the amount actually paid in coin.

When the second instalment became due, the Bank of the United States was in operation, and had issued a large amount of its notes; bills were also discounted and passed to the credit of individuals, and specie received on deposit; therefore, the notes of and checks on the bank were equivalent to specie, and would have drawn out the specie to pay the cash part of the instalment; if the literal formality of paying in specie had been required. The general course pursued by the subscribers was to deposit the coin and notes in the bank, and draw a check for the precise amount of the cash part of the instalment.

The banks in the principal cities resumed specie payment on the 20th of February, 1817, and the third instalment became due on the 1st of July following; their notes were, of course, received in all payments due to the bank and to the revenue, and also on deposit, for which specie was liable to be drawn; of course, the notes of and checks on the Bank of the United States, and the notes of the banks actually paying specie, were indiscriminately received with gold and silver in payment of the cash part of this instalment.

In the statement exhibiting the debts due to the bank and its offices, the amount of bills discounted bears an undue proportion to the relative trade and importance of the respective places; but the efforts of the board of directors to produce a more equal apportionment have been counteracted by circumstances which they could not control, the origin of which may be referred to the state of the currency and of domestic exchange at the period immediately preceding the establishment of the bank, the consequences of which are yet visible in the moneyed operations of those places.

The funds of the cities east of Philadelphia, derived from the sale of their imported commodities, had been suffered to accumulate during the late war, and until the establishment of the bank, chiefly in the cities of Philadelphia and Baltimore, to an immense amount, in anticipation of that event and the prospects entertained of the consequent improvement in the currency. The public revenue had also accumulated in the middle and western sections of the United States, to the amount of many millions, particularly in the banks of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and the District of Columbia; and the banks of those places were greatly indebted to those to the eastward of them respectively.

Shortly after this period, as you will recollect, sir, the banks of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Virginia, agreed to resume specie payments on the 20th of February, under a special agreement with the Bank of the United States, which, in order to bring about this desirable and indispensable event, engaged its credit and resources in protecting the debtor banks, and in liquidating these immense balances by actual remittances to the eastward in specie and bills at par as the only possible means of maintaining what had been so happily begun. In the mean time, the public deposits in the banks of those places which had been transferred to the Bank of the United States, and the revenue subsequently collected in the same, were chiefly expended in the cities east of the Susquehanna.

These circumstances have constantly maintained so great a demand for exchange in the eastern cities, that the directors have been unable to extend the discounts at the offices at New York and Boston, as they have earnestly desired to do, without getting in debt to the banks of those places, and incurring the immediate liability to a demand of payment in specie; of the large importations of which by the Bank of the United States, at a great expense, not one dollar has been expended south or west of Philadelphia. It is a fact, corroborated by the experience of all banks, that their operations must necessarily be regulated by those of the banks in their immediate vicinity, otherwise those which are most prudent or parsimonious will become the creditors of those who are the most liberal or extravagant; the consequence of which is an immediate specie responsibility. The Bank of the United States and its offices do not form an exception to this rule; and facts have demonstrated that a bank of very limited resources, governed by an avaricious policy, and applying its means not to the purpose of public accommodation, but to the traffic in specie, by collecting the bills of other banks, drawing out the specie for sale, and repeating the operation daily, may subject the largest capital to incessant contribution. It is conceived that what has been said will satisfactorily prove that the Bank of the United States could not remit and liquidate debts of the southern, western, and middle sections, to the eastern cities, and at the same time loan a large additional capital to the latter; and that, if the latter have not participated in the loans of the bank in proportion to their great wealth and commerce, they have at least derived as substantial benefits from the operations of the bank as any other section of the Union.

In regard to the discounts on bills secured by the pledge of public and corporate stocks, it is respectfully observed, that these loans originated in the sudden redemption of $13,000,000 of the funded debt, part of the capital of the bank, with the public funds which had been transferred to the bank in the manner represented. This event took place in a few months after the bank had commenced its operations, when few of its offices were in operation, and while the circumstances of the institution precluded the possibility of an equitable distribution of its capital. It therefore became a desirable object to employ this capital for the benefit of the institution without delay; and the only question which the case appeared to involve was, whether the loans ought to be made on the collateral security of public and corporate stocks, or on the more precarious security of mere personal responsibility, where that species of accommodation did not appear to admit of so great an extension. The board determined upon the former course, and proceeded to discount bills on the pledge of stock, without regard to persons or place, and indiscriminately, to the extent which it was offered; and, of course, the greatest loans have been where the greatest amount of stock was held. The whole amount of the loans on pledged stock of every description has not at any time reached by two millions the amount of the funded debt redeemed by the Government, although the original amount of the funded debt, part of the capital of the bank, was intended to have been $28,000,000. To have loaned these funds in New York and Boston, would have required their previous conversion into specie, or the funds of those cities, which, from the course of exchange, and the extraordinary demand for specie, was impracticable; and to have demanded the immediate payment of specie due by the banks in Philadelphia, Baltimore, District of Columbia, and the western country, would have been to require impossibilities. The funds were therefore loaned where they were current, and in their operation produced the gradual diminution of the debts due by the banks in those places to the Bank of the United States, which they had not the ability to discharge in specie on demand. The reason why no part of the coin in possession of the bank is exhibited in the statement No. 2 of the existing capital of the bank is assigned in the note annexed to that statement; but the whole amount of specie in the bank and its offices at that time was $2,815,208 96, as exhibited in the general statement rendered to the Department.

The crisis in which the directors of the Bank of the United States have acted, has been one of peculiar delicacy and difficulty. The policy and effect of their administration cannot be appreciated by an abstract view of any single measure; it must be taken in connexion with every other which it involves. They have earnestly endeavored to promote the interest of the public and of the institution, but they disclaim the presumption that would exempt them from error.

I have the honor to remain, &c.

WM. JONES, Pres't.

Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 27, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to return the statements which were enclosed in your letter of the 11th instant. By comparing these statements with the reports of the Register of the Treasury, which are now transmitted for your consideration, it will appear that the amount of the funded debt purchased or redeemed by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund from the bank, exceeds the whole amount stated by you to have been received by the bank; whilst it is admitted that about $400,000 of the funded debt was in the possession of the bank at the date of those statements. The information required by the resolution is more detailed than that which is furnished by the bank. You have given the amount of funded debt subscribed to the bank, at each of the payments, without distinguishing between the different species of stock of which the several payments were composed. It is, I think, manifest, that the resolution requires this distinction.

The difference between the amount of stock stated to have been received by the bank at the different periods of the payment, and that which has been redeemed, arises, probably, from the circumstance of excluding, in the statement made by the bank, all the stock which was received at dates subsequent to the several periods when the different instalments became due.

As soon as the statements required by the resolution of the Senate are received, they will be communicated to that body. I am, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

WM. JONES, Esq., President U. S. Bank.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 1, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the statements required by the resolution of the Senate of the 15th of April last, which were communicated with my explanatory letter of the 11th ultimo, and returned under cover with your letter of the 27th ultimo, having substituted, agreeably to your construction of the first member of that resolution, a statement more in detail, exhibiting the amount of the several species of funded debt subscribed to the bank, and including as well the payments made subsequently to the times prescribed by the charter, as the payments made at those periods, which the words of the resolution appeared alone to require; thus at once embracing the whole amount of the capital stock actually paid in gold and silver coin, or bank notes and checks equivalent thereto, and in funded debt; from which the amount of funded debt redeemed by the Government from the bank being deducted, shows the balance of funded debt remaining as a part of the capital stock of the bank at this time. The result accords with the statement No. 1 of the Register of the Treasury, showing the amount of the several species of funded debt redeemed from the bank, with the books of the bank and the loan office carefully examined. I have the honor, &c.

WM. JONES.

Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The President of the Bank of the United States to the Secretary of the Treasury.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES,

December 1, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to return the statement No. 2, of the Register of the Treasury, showing the "amount of stock to the credit of the Bank of the United States, per dividends, to the 30th June, 1818." This statement refers to the date just mentioned, but appears also to be brought up to the 21st October, as the moiety only of the Louisiana debt held by the bank at the former date is included in the amount.

The notes, however, which I have added to the foot of the statement, reconcile the statement No. 1, rendered by order of the Senate, with the statement No. 2 of the Register, with which it agrees within one cent. I have the honor to be, &c.

W. JONES.

Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD,

TUESDAY, December 8.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th of April last, referring the reports of the Commissioners for the districts east and west of Pearl river, in West Florida, relative to land claims, together with the memorials, petitions, and other papers addressed to the Senate upon the same subject, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and directing him to report a plan to the Senate at their next session, for the adjustment of the claims to lands in said districts, accompanied by a draft of a bill for that purpose; which were read.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of James Wilde, reported the same with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. WILSON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Chapman, collector of the customs for Georgetown district, in the State of South Carolina, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted. The report and resolution were read.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill to increase the compensation of the surveyor of the port of Patuxet, in Rhode Island; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BURRILL gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to introduce a bill respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor.

MEMORIAL OF MATTHEW LYON.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Matthew Lyon, of Eddyville, in the State of Kentucky, praying reimbursement of a certain fine, imposed in the year 1798, at the suit of the United States, together with the costs and other losses attending the same, to wit: "That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted." Whereupon, Mr. CRITTENDEN submitted the following motion as an amendment:

Resolved, That all persons, who were prosecuted and fined under and by virtue of the second section of the act of Congress, commonly called the sedition law, approved the 14th day of July, 1798, and entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,'" ought to be reimbursed and indemnified out of the public Treasury, to the amount of the fines imposed upon, and paid by them, respectively.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he considered the sedition act as having been unconstitutional, not only from a defect of power in Congress to pass such a law, but because its passage was expressly forbidden by the Constitution. The sense of the nation had unquestionably pronounced it unconstitutional, and that opinion being generally entertained, it ought to be solemnly pronounced by the Legislature, that history and the records of the country may not hand it down to posterity as a precedent for acts of similar usurpation. If a revision of the proceedings in that case was important in a public point of view, it was certainly so as it related to the individuals who became the subjects of prosecution under that act. To each of them, and to every citizen of the United States, the Constitution of the United States had guaranteed certain rights, which had been violated by that law. This guarantee entitled them to indemnity in cases wherein those rights were violated; of this indemnity, the decisions of courts ought not to deprive them. If they did, he said, there is no redeeming spirit in the Constitution. Legal sanctions cannot vitiate Constitutional provisions. The Judiciary is a valuable part of Government, and ought to be highly respected; but is not infallible. The Constitution is our guide—our supreme law. Blind homage can never be rendered by freemen to any power. In all cases of alleged violations of the Constitution, it was for Congress to make a just discrimination. In doubtful cases, he said, he would not interfere; but, when the Constitution forbade a law, he would not hesitate to interpose for the relief of those who suffered by its inflictions. The case now before the Senate, he considered a fair case for the interposition of Congress. It had a peculiar character. The individual had a right to remuneration; this right ought not to be sacrificed to contingencies, or to speculative opinions. We may not do wrong that right may come of it. Justice to the individuals, to the Constitution, to the country, all required this course. Let us add, said Mr. C., new defences and guards to the Constitution in this assailable point. Let us secure it, as far as in our power, from future infraction on the ground of precedent.

Mr. BURRILL said he hoped the amendment would not prevail. If it was negatived, the gentleman would yet have it in his power to try the general question by introducing a bill embracing his proposition. But, Mr. B. said, not a fact alleged in the petition now before the Senate was supported by any proof, though the facts were extraordinary in their nature, and not to be believed without proof. The petitioner had asked relief from Congress, on the ground of not having had a fair trial. Ought not this to be proved, instead of being merely asserted? He had called Judge Patterson a second Jeffries, himself an Algernon Sydney; but this was not a ground on which the Senate could found a legislative act. The question regarding the Constitutionality of the act of Congress, which had been agitated, Mr. B. said he would not argue; not that he had any doubts on the subject, but because it was unnecessary now to discuss it. The question really before the Senate was one which could be discussed without reference to the character of Judge Patterson, and without reflecting on the administration of justice in the courts of our country. The facts alleged were not proved, and Mr. B. believed they were not susceptible of proof. There might have existed in the public mind, amidst the conflict of parties, prejudices for and against Matthew Lyon; but Judge Patterson never could have been guilty of the acts alleged. It was proposed now to interfere with the judicial proceedings of the country, in a manner in which they never had been interfered with in this or any other country, by setting aside decisions of the courts, and indemnifying the parties who were the subject of them, and that, too, without proof. He did not, he said, believe in the infallibility of the Judiciary; but neither did he in that of Congress. The gentleman himself, who thought himself quite right, might be mistaken in his views, as infallibility did not belong to humanity. What right, Mr. B. asked, had Congress to pass on the Constitutionality of this law? They could repeal laws, but they could not revise the adjudications under them. The law had been passed by Congress, and been executed by the courts of the United States, after solemn examination. If Congress were to interfere in this case, they might in all others; and the Senate would see to what consequences the establishment of this principle would lead. Against such evils as the petitioner alleged, they might guard by law, with a view to prevention; but, having occurred, they could only interfere in extreme cases, and that in the manner prescribed in the Constitution—by impeachment and removal of the Judge. To proceed as now proposed, would be, instead of considering the Judiciary in its true light of a co-ordinate branch of the Government, to render it dependent and subordinate. If Congress were so to act, said he, posterity might impute to them party feelings, as we now do to those who have gone before us. Let us not then pronounce censure on any past Congress, or on the acts of the Judiciary.

Mr. BARBOUR said he had not intended to speak on this question, unless impelled by an imperious sense of duty. He was happy, he said, that the question presented to the Senate, instead of being decided on the merit or demerit of an individual, was to be decided on the broad ground of principle. Was the course proposed in the amendment, he asked, an unusual course? Was it not a daily practice to include all who were in the same predicament in the same remedy? An individual, Mr. B. said, was responsible for any charges he made; and they are not to be received as facts until satisfactorily proved. Let not, therefore, the great Constitutional question now presented rest on the merit of the claim of a single individual, or be encumbered by questions of fact peculiar to an isolated case. The true question now to be decided, was, did the Government, by the sedition act of 1798, from improper motives or party feelings, violate the Constitution and oppress individuals? If they did, ought not the new trustees to whom the people had confided their authority, to remedy the evil as far as in their power? The public sentiment, he said, called upon Congress to repair the wrongs which had been inflicted, and to administer, like the good Samaritan, the healing balm to every wound. This, he thought, was a propitious moment to retrace the former steps, in deference to the opinion of the people, and erect a barrier against the recurrence of similar aggressions of power on inherent and Constitutional right. This, he said, was not the tribunal to take cognizance of judicial delinquency: that was the province of the other House. But it was quite within the power of this body, as one branch of the Legislature, to pronounce that those who gave the authority exercised by the judiciary had no right to do so, and that, therefore, the judiciary had proceeded unconstitutionally in executing the law, the Constitution being the paramount law. He believed, he said, our courts were the purest in the world; but those who composed them were mere men, and some of them, possibly, bad men. Was there anything, he asked, in the ermine robe, which conferred on the wearer exemption from human frailties? It was rather calculated to inflate the vanity, and increase the confidence of the judge in his own infallibility. He would not, he said, act indelicately towards the judiciary, or any member of it; but, in regard to the violation of the Constitution, in the passage and execution of the sedition law, a tribunal from which there was no appeal had decided on it. There was among the people, at this day, scarcely a dissentient voice on that subject. Would the decision of four or five individuals counterbalance this unanimous opinion? The sedition act, Mr. B. proceeded to say, was one of the most conspicuous among the acts of misrule, in consequence of which the party who then held the reins of Government was precipitated from power. The law, he said, was unconstitutional, and Congress ought to say so, and to repair the ravages made under color of its authority. Suppose Congress had decreed the punishment of death and corruption of blood for the offences designated in the act; they had the same right to do that as what they did do. Suppose the victim had been immolated, and his property confiscated, and that the heirs had applied for a reversal of the attainder, the same answer might be given as was now given by the gentleman from Rhode Island, that we ought not to interfere. This, he said, was not the answer due by Congress to such an application. Apprehensions had been expressed, that, from a different course, great inconveniences were to be feared. Mr. B. thought not. It would teach men in authority that, too often, in possession of power, they forgot right: it would teach them to look forward to the sentiments which posterity would entertain of their conduct. Our halcyon days, said he, may not always continue. We ought to erect land marks for the benefit of future ages; we ought to encourage future patriots to resist usurpation. Our Government, he said, was made for the people, and for the conservation of their rights; and we ought to repair injuries unrighteously inflicted on them. But, if precedents were to be sought in the history of other Governments, there were precedents to be found in British history.

The successors of the Stuarts repaired, as far as in their power, the injuries they had done. In the case of Russell, he was permitted to resume the right of blood and property—and other cases might be cited. When Congress, the President, or the Judiciary, exceeds the powers delegated them by the Constitution, the people have a right to resist unto blood. By way of illustration, Mr. B. put a case: had Burr, he said, been imposed on the nation as President by Congress, bloody vengeance would have pursued the usurper and his confederates. In the case of the sedition law there was no need of a resort to force; the redeeming spirit of the people was appealed to; it was roused, and it was effective. The actors in these scenes were driven from power, and covered with popular displeasure. But had anything been done to redress the individual wrongs inflicted? Certainly not. For one, he said, he wished to enter his solemn protest in this case, that, if a name so insignificant as his should ever meet the eye of posterity, it might be seen how he had acted on this occasion. What had been unconstitutionally exacted Congress ought to restore. The Senate, he said, ought to look at the consequences of acting on different grounds. What individual, he asked, would have patriotism and firmness enough hereafter to resist oppression, unless this excitement of indemnity for injury should be held out? The case of the sufferers under the sedition law would forewarn them from attempting to resist the exercise of arbitrary authority. Mr. B. concluded his animated speech by a brief recapitulation of his argument. Independent of all consideration of the merits or demerits of the particular case before the Senate, he was in favor of granting relief, generally, in all that class of cases, on the principle, that, when a man has been injured by an unconstitutional law, it is the bounden duty of Congress to repair the breach, and enter up a protest against the injury. This, he said, was an unique case, and one in which this great fundamental principle could be safely established. To show at least what his opinion was on the subject, Mr. B. required the question on the motion to be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. ORRIS said, this debate was wholly unexpected by him, until the gentleman from Kentucky gave him an intimation a day or two ago, that he intended to oppose the report of the committee. He did not then intend to interfere, as he believed the few observations he might make would be wholly unprofitable; and nothing but some allusions which had been made, would induce him to address the Senate. He was the only member of Congress, now in the Senate, who voted for the sedition law; and there were but four or five in the other House, who had aided in passing this law. It might be expected he would let the world see he was not ashamed of his old friends, nor of his old principles. He was not now an advocate for a sedition law. The public opinion, as clearly ascertained, forbade it. He respected this opinion as sincerely as those who much oftener referred to it. It was his inclination, as well as his duty, to conform to it. But, though he would not repeat the offence, he could not repent it. In supporting that law on its passage, he acted from a sense of duty. Those who acted with him, were governed by motives equally honorable. He admitted the law was inexpedient, but he thought gentlemen mistaken when they pronounced it unconstitutional. This question had been ably discussed, as well by those who were opposed to the law, as by those who advocated it; and he should not now enter deeply into the subject. Every Government had an inherent right to punish offences which endangered its existence; and on this definition he relied for a justification of the law. If the President and Congress were convinced there was a necessity for such a law, they had a right to enact it. It was passed in a period of great danger and alarm. It was true, it had been said these were chimerical. He trusted this would not now be said. It was a period of war, and of threatened invasion. Our ministers of peace had been spurned by the French Republic, who had demanded more money. The nation was preparing to resist. At this moment the law was passed. It was a measure of defence—a part of the general system. Of this system WASHINGTON approved, and accepted the command of the Army. Mr. O. did not wish to excite unpleasant feelings, and would endeavor to avoid it. There was one argument more he would urge. Had gentlemen lately read the law? If they had, they would remember that its second section only punished the publication of false, scandalous, and malicious matter, and admitted the truth to be given in the defence. He had always been surprised that this section was found fault with, while the first section, defining a conspiracy, and prescribing its punishment, had been passed over without animadversion. The law was doubtless inexpedient, but it was not new in principle. Similar provisions existed in several of the States; and this act was deemed essential for the defence of the Constitution and its authorities. It was not intended to affect the poor individuals who became its victims; but it was thought that France, who was everywhere endeavoring to extend her influence by intrigue and corruption, would, by her agents, busy herself in our concerns, and, that the provisions of this act were necessary to defeat their efforts, and preserve the Government. No matter whether those apprehensions were unfounded or not—they existed. Nor need it be wondered at. We had since seen and heard it asserted, that the finger of Great Britain was discovered in the proceedings of men, whose principles, services, lives, families, and fortunes, were certain pledges of their fidelity to their country. But, admitting that gentlemen are correct, and that indelible stigma should be stamped on the law and its authors, can Congress remedy the wrong done? We have no Constitutional power to declare any law unconstitutional, in any other mode than by repealing it. If gentlemen thought we had, he would thank them to point out the clause. They could not do it. We have no such power. The Judiciary could do justice in such cases, but the Legislature cannot. Have we any precedent? He would not admit the extreme cases put by the gentleman from Virginia. This was an ordinary case—had we any precedent for interfering here? None. Would there be any use in adopting this measure? It might be a precedent for another Congress to pass a resolution restoring the Constitution to the construction given it by the sedition law. The honorable gentleman was not sent here to do this act; it was not connected with his legislative powers. He dreaded the consequences which might flow from the proposed resolution. Gentlemen seemed to have lost sight of analogies; and the sedition law alone was the "hydra and chimera dire." But, take the embargo laws and their execution. Many eminent statesmen deemed them unconstitutional. They believed the power given to Congress, to regulate commerce, did not carry with it the power to destroy commerce. Mr. DEXTER had publicly and boldly denounced the embargo as unconstitutional; and he might fairly be deemed the parent of all the heresies, if such they were, which prevailed in the East on this subject. Yet, he soon found favor with the Government. Some ten, fifteen, or twenty years hence, the question may be raised concerning the constitutionality of the embargo laws, and the propriety of restoring fines and forfeitures under them. Suppose a gentleman should then address the Senate, as the gentleman from Virginia now does, with the same zeal and eloquence, would he not be able to arouse our prejudices and feelings against the embargo laws? But were there no other cases? The United States Bank was once deemed unconstitutional, and had been so pronounced by the great inquest of the nation, of which the gentleman from Virginia had spoken. But this opinion had passed away, and it had been found useful and necessary, and admitted to be Constitutional. Is there nothing else on which controversies like this may hereafter arise? Yes—roads and canals. Was there not a great difference of opinion as to the constitutionality of these? Suppose these should hereafter be called in question, and motions made to restore fines and penalties incurred under them? Would not this create great difficulties and injuries? These effects naturally flowed from this act; and we ought to avoid them. The great corrective of errors of our Government was in public opinion—this was the redeeming spirit. But gentlemen said the remedy this afforded was not perfect. Were any of our laws or institutions perfect? To our feeble perceptions, were the dispensations of God himself perfect? Individual cases ought not to interfere with the general safety or welfare. But, by what test will the gentleman from Virginia satisfy you that the revolution in the Government was effected by the sedition act? Was not this act combined with many other measures, which have been since re-enacted and adopted by the majority with whom that gentleman acts? Suppose a dialogue should take place between a gentleman now in the majority, and one formerly so—and such a dialogue might be carried on in perfect good humor. The former might say "you acted extremely wrong and indiscreet when you were in power, and well deserved to be displaced." That may be, replies the other, but I should like to be informed in what particulars? "Why, you raised a standing army." True, we raised a provisional army in time of war; but you maintain a standing army, much larger, in time of profound peace. "But you established a navy!" We did—and your most eloquent men opposed it with all their energy; but you have found, on experience, that you must have a navy, and to your honor you have imitated the example we set you. "But you borrowed money, at eight per cent." So did you, at almost double that rate of interest. But what else did we do? "You passed alien and sedition acts." Well, you did not pass an alien act; but an act concerning alien enemies, not much unlike it. You did not pass a sedition law—but this was only one link in the chain, and was not the means of the change which took place. The whole of our measures, taken in connexion, occasioned our expulsion from power; you have adopted them all but one, and remain in. The people bear you out, and would not us. We are content. God speed you. On the whole, Mr. O. said, he thought it inexpedient and improper for Congress to form itself into a high court of errors, and interfere in the present case, and thus arouse party feelings, and establish a dangerous precedent.

Mr. SMITH said, that, being of the committee who reported against the petition, and of opinion that the prayer of it ought not to be granted, he deemed it a duty to offer his reasons for differing from the gentlemen from Kentucky and Virginia. He was in favor of the report, and against the amendment. His political principles were and always had been republican or (as they had been formerly called, by way of reproach) democratic. His principles had never changed, nor was it probable they ever would. He was sorry gentlemen had gone so deep into the question, as it might awaken feelings which had better be permitted slumber. When the sedition law passed, public opinion revolted against its principles and provisions, not because it was unconstitutional, but because of the temper manifested in enacting and executing it, which induced a belief that the object was to crush all opposition to the party in power. That party were continually pouring in addresses upon the President, applauding his measures, and denouncing those who differed from them in opinion. The very children presented their adulatory offerings; and it was remarked by some one at the time, that the President had as many addresses in his bureau as James the First had. The Democrats were denounced, and the President called on to remove them all from office; and on every removal of one of them, addresses were sent to the President approving his conduct. This created the alarm. To this violence the sedition law owed the opposition it experienced, and not to the belief that it was unconstitutional. The times were not now what they were in 1798. The Government now admitted its opponents to a participation in its offices, and its friends did not clamor for their dismissal.

But he would drop this subject, and return to the question. The gentlemen from Massachusetts and Rhode Island justly opposed the assumption by Congress to decide on the constitutionality of a law. Our Constitution had very properly separated the powers of Government—the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial. They should be kept separate. The Judiciary was to construe laws. Congress could not reverse their decisions, nor repair their injuries. When they had passed a law, and the President signed it, they could not touch it, unless to repeal or amend it. The opinions of legal men ought to have great weight. The Judiciary was composed of such. They were selected for their legal acquirements. They deliberated well before they decided. They would not have stooped to party purposes, but they gave the law its full operation. This could give Congress no right to interfere. Are you to presume the judges were perjured and prostituted? We ought not to do so without proof; and we have here only the suggestions and recollections of eighteen or twenty years ago. And he must here say, the petitioner had here given evidence that he can now write bitterly, if he did not then. He appealed to gentlemen who had professionally studied law, whether the sedition act was unconstitutional. He was not satisfied it was so, but inclined to think otherwise. In this case at least, the applicant ought not to be believed, as there was no evidence of the truth of his allegations. In the infancy of our Government, the common law of England was adopted. This formed the proof of any fact alleged, and was much more severe than the sedition law. Under the common law, instead of admitting the truth as a justification, "The greater the truth, the greater the libel." The jury could only decide on the act of publication, and the court could fine and imprison at their discretion. There was no offence punishable by the sedition act but was indictable at common law, save perhaps in a single case; and while under the former the truth might be given in evidence, and the jury had cognizance both of law and fact, under the latter the truth but aggravated the offence, and the offender was at the mercy of the court. The sedition law was therefore an amelioration of the common law. But the great evil was in the spirit which prevailed in its enactment and administration. He should not follow the gentleman from Massachusetts on the subject of the embargo laws, &c., but, if you indemnify Matthew Lyon under this unconstitutional law, suppose the party who passed the law should regain the ascendancy—which he was not without apprehension of, notwithstanding they extended to us the right hand of fellowship, and professed to think we were "all Republicans, all Federalists"—they might repeal this law, take the money again out of his hands, and put it into the Treasury, as we were about to take it out of the Treasury and put it into his hands. Another Congress might reverse this proceeding, and refund him the money. This zigzag course might be endless. This was too apparent to be questioned. He had always gone with the party in power, in most of their measures. He still should do so, when they were right. He thought they were not so in this proposition; that we had no right to adopt it; that it would be dangerous as a precedent; and that precedents were already obtaining too much influence in legislation. They are likely soon to have more authority than the Constitution. If you refund Matthew Lyon's fine, where are we to stop? He would like to be informed, for he could not himself see.

Mr. MAcon had hoped the resolution would be discussed on its merits, as it did not even mention Matthew Lyon's name. The true question was, will you review the proceedings under the sedition law, now, while party spirit is hushed, and all is calm? This calm he did not wish to disturb. But if you agree to the report, and reject the petition, how will you bring the question before you? He was told the precedent would be dangerous. He would meet this at once. If any party in power thought it their duty to follow it, let them do so. He did not admire precedent more than the gentleman from South Carolina, but, when wrong was done, it ought to be righted. The adoption of the Constitution, and the state of things abroad and at home, which ensued, had excited heats in the country; and he supposed both parties were sometimes wrong. The country is now peaceful, and we can act free from prejudice or party. He should not attempt to discuss the constitutionality of the sedition law. He had often been heard on this subject, and he supposed every man had made up his mind on the question. If the Senate was satisfied the law was unconstitutional, they ought to adopt the resolution; if they had doubts, they ought to reject it. Some facts were stated in the petition not known to him; but he believed Matthew Lyon had remunerated all the members who advanced money to relieve him from his fine. According to some gentlemen we were to regard the judiciary more than the law, and both more than the Constitution. It was a misfortune the judges were not equal in infallibility to the God who made them. The truth was, if the judge was a party man out of power, he would be a party man in. The office would not change human nature. He had no doubt that the sedition law, and the proceedings under it, had more effect in revolutionizing the Government than all its other acts. He well remembered the language of the times—pay your taxes, but don't speak against Government. The gentleman from Massachusetts admits the inexpediency of the law, but not its unconstitutionality. This was of itself a great concession. Would he, or the gentleman from South Carolina, put his finger on the clause of the Constitution which authorized that law? He would not impute evil motives—he had nothing to do with them, but with acts. He would have preferred a silent vote; but, being referred to in the petition, he could not be silent. Money is paid back daily from the Treasury to individuals, without its being called revising the decision of the judges. He did not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts about the powers of the Government. That gentleman thought it might do any act necessary to its preservation. He, Mr. M. believed it could not go beyond the Constitution. We have in this country two governments. The Constitution defines the powers of the General Government, and leaves the State governments untouched. He thought the position clear, that if there was no Constitutional power to pass the law, the money was taken wrongfully, and ought to be restored. Mr. MAcon was sorry the names of judges had been introduced. We ought to pass lightly over the ashes of the dead. Let them sleep quietly with their fathers—he would not disturb them. He regretted that the gentleman from South Carolina had spoken of the manner in which the petition was drawn. The effect of this might be to create disgust with the man, and thus weaken the arguments in favor of the claim. We had nothing to do with the person but with the principle. He thought the gentleman was also mistaken in the law of England on the subject of libels. He had read a speech of Mr. Erskine, on what occasion he did not recollect, which he thought conclusive and satisfactory, that the truth might there be given in evidence.

Mr. SMITH explained. He said his friend from North Carolina had misconceived some of his arguments. He had not meant to enforce his arguments by traducing the petitioner; and, perhaps, he had better not have mentioned him. He had not said the sedition law was Constitutional; but, as the Judiciary had decided it was so, he could not withhold his assent. The common law of England was the law of many of the States at the time the sedition law was enacted. He did not particularly recollect the speech which the gentleman from North Carolina adverted to; but had no doubt the representation he had given of it was correct. In England the common law had been ameliorated in some measure by a bill introduced by Mr. Fox, which admitted the truth to be given in evidence in relation to public officers. The Constitution had been quoted—"Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." This was intended to secure the liberty of the press, but not its licentiousness. It meant to protect the truth—not falsehood. He thought Congress had no right to construe their own laws—this power belonged exclusively to the Judiciary. If we may abrogate one law by explanation, we may another; and thus frustrate the ends of government.

Mr. MAcon said he thought the power of punishing libels remained in the State governments, and was not conveyed to the General Government. He added a few words, which were not distinctly heard.

The Senate adjourned, without taking the question.

WEDNESDAY, December 9.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Director of the Mint, giving the result of sundry assays made of the several species of foreign gold and silver coins made current in the United States, by an act of Congress, passed the 29th of April, 1816; and the letter and report were read.—Referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 4th instant, referring, to a select committee, the Message of the President, and documents relative to the Seminole war; and, on motion by Mr. LACOCK, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Friday next.

Agreeably to notice given, Mr. BURRILL asked, and obtained leave, to introduce a bill, respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor; and the bill was read, and it passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Chapman, collector of the customs for the Georgetown District, in the State of South Carolina; and in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, and the appointment of circuit judges, together with the motion to recommit the bill with instructions; and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Barton;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William King;" "A bill entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Adolphus Burghart, deceased;" and also, a bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the military service of the United States, for the year 1819, and to make good a deficit in the appropriation for holding treaties with the Indians;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have concurred in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee, to consider and report whether any further provisions by law are necessary, relative to the printing done by order of Congress, with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution last mentioned, and concurred therein; and Mr. WILSON, Mr. LACOCK, and Mr. BURRILL, were appointed the committee on their part.

The four bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

The engrossed resolution directing a survey of certain parts of the coast of North Carolina was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Matthew Barrow; and, no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payment thereon; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to Monday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act respecting invalids;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William B. Lewis;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Frederick Brown;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

CESSION OF FLORIDA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, having obtained leave, withdrew the resolution submitted by him some days ago, respecting a provisional occupation of East Florida; and in lieu thereof submitted the following, which lies on the table one day of course:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate, copies of the correspondence between the Government of the United States, and the Government of Spain, relative to the cession of the Floridas to the United States, which has not already been communicated and which, in his opinion, may be communicated with safety to the public interest.

In withdrawing the one resolution, and offering the other, Mr. JOHNSON said, in substance, that he was not influenced by any change of opinion on the subject of his first proposition; he believed it to be the proper course to be ultimately pursued; an opinion confirmed by information he had seen in the New Orleans papers, that hostilities were yet rife between the Seminoles and the frontier settlers. But, having understood, that a correspondence had been going on between our Government and the Minister of Spain, he had thought it would be proper to understand first what was the result of this correspondence, as it might have some bearing on the object he had in view. He, therefore, for the present waived his motion, desiring it to be understood that he reserved the right of renewing it, should it still appear necessary, after the information required by his present motion should be received.

MEMORIAL OF MATTHEW LYON.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Judiciary Committee unfavorable to the petition of Matthew Lyon; Mr. CRITTENDEN's motion to reverse the report, and to make general provision for the indemnification of all similar cases occurring under the sedition law, being yet under consideration:

Mr. MORRIS said, the discussion had taken a course which was unexpected; and he felt it a duty to make some remarks, and assign the reasons which would govern his vote. The question turned on the constitutionality of the sedition law. He was opposed to the resolution, because he believed the law Constitutional. The law only punished false, licentious, and malicious writings. The Constitution did not mean to prohibit a law to punish these. It was intended to cherish virtue and morality, and to preserve our rights and privileges; and which of these did we esteem higher than reputation? The Constitution prohibited any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. Now, freedom and liberty are synonymous and convertible terms. The law was not intended to abridge the liberty of the press, but its licentiousness. The second section allowed the truth to be given in evidence. If the publication was licentious, the charge could not be supported, and the offender would be punished. If it contained facts, they could be maintained, and an acquittal would take place. He was opposed to the resolution on another ground—this was not the proper tribunal to decide the question of unconstitutionality. The judiciary was the proper tribunal. If Congress should indemnify in one case, they might in others—and where would we stop? All would be confusion and uncertainty. The consequence appeared to him alarming. We have no proof of corruption in the judges—no evidence of the facts stated in the petition. All were unsupported allegations upon which we were called to act in this case; though, in support of claims, it was usual to require the oaths of parties, as well as other testimony. Another reason why he was opposed to this resolution, was, that we had many claims more just and equitable. He believed the law Constitutional, and that the petitioner suffered justly according to law. But there were many sufferers by the late war—many bereaved widows and helpless orphans, who needed and deserved our assistance. These claimed the preference, and ought to be first relieved.

Mr. CRITTENDEN felt himself bound to reply to some observations which had been made. The public voice had determined the unconstitutionality of the sedition law: it had removed one party from power, and elevated another. He had expected Congress would confirm the decision of the people. He should be sorry if he were disappointed; but it would be a great consolation that the opinion of the nation was with him. The proposition that the law was unconstitutional, appeared to him so plain, that he feared an attempt at demonstration would but involve in darkness a question as clear as sunshine. The Constitution says "Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of the press." If this law did not abridge that freedom, why was it passed? No law of the General Government then existed on the subject: the State authorities alone took cognizance of libels. That the Constitution was meant as a mere moral restraint, was a novel idea. The convention who formed it, was not a conventicle of Puritans, but an assemblage of statesmen. The morals of the nation were left to other tribunals: political motives alone led to its formation and adoption, and to the provision referred to. The framers of it well knew that the licentiousness of the press was not as much to be feared as the power to restrain its freedom. History was full of examples on this point. Our Government was different from all others in its principles, objects, and provisions. The press, so far from being dangerous to it, was its greatest safeguard. No ruler was above its animadversion, nor beyond its influence. Tyrants, all over the world, dreaded its effects in imparting light and energy to the human mind. But what had our Government—a Government of the people—to fear from it? It could not injure, it could not affect it. Experience had verified this. When all the offices in the country were in the hands of a party, wealthy, influential, and powerful, all could not save them. On the other hand, had not our former illustrious Chief Magistrate, who was brought into power by means of the sedition law, and other correspondent measures, been assailed with the most infamous and vindictive abuse and slander? Had it sullied his public or private character? Had it lessened the affection or confidence of the people? No—the press could only have influence when it conformed to public sentiment; its licentiousness can only be dangerous to those who misrule. It was but a faithful sentinel, to announce the approach of public danger, and excite the people to vigilance. Mr. C. admitted that the States might pass such laws as the one alluded to; but the General Government could not. The former possessed the right—to the latter, the power was never delegated. The fair construction of the sedition law was, that it could punish anything that tended to bring the rulers into contempt or disrepute. Opinions, however well-founded, were not susceptible of proof—yet they were subject to punishment. Truth, if it could not be proved, was as punishable as falsehood. The gentleman from South Carolina had called it an amelioration of the common law. O tender mercies of the sedition law! Happy amelioration of the common law! How blind had the people been to the benevolent intentions of the law! How ungrateful for the protection it afforded them! But the gentleman had forgotten that, when this act passed, there was no common law on the subject in the General Government, and that this act introduced the first restraint on the press. Ought we then to withhold the money paid under this unconstitutional law? If the law was a violation of the national compact, which guaranteed to every individual freedom to speak and to publish what he chose, could we retain fines incurred under this law? In a moral point of view, the money ought to be refunded; and he knew not on what ground the claim could be resisted. For the judiciary he felt a proper respect; but he would not bow submissively to everything the judiciary should say. As a man, and as a member of the Senate, he had a right to form opinions for himself. The Constitution he regarded as the supreme law, and entitled to our first attention and respect. By this resolution we should cast no stigma on any judge or court: it was not revising any judicial decision; it was no indelicacy to the judiciary. The blame attached to Congress more than to the judiciary. We ourselves have done an injurious act; it is for us to repair the wrong. There was no more indelicacy in the present case, than there would be in moving the repeal of a law. He thought gentlemen quite too sensitive on this subject. He had no wish to cast a stigma on either the judiciary or Congress—no desire to impute impure motives to either; but purity of motive could not make the law Constitutional. Victorious parties might pursue their adversaries too far, as well in the Senate as in the field; hence arose the act in question. The stability of the judiciary was not to be affected by this resolution. He judged the law by the Constitution. He did not like the judiciary less than others, but he loved the Constitution more. He deemed it both proper and necessary to adopt this resolution. He was surprised to hear gentlemen, and Republicans too, say the law was not deemed unconstitutional. He thought this point had long been put beyond controversy, and his object was to evoke and call forth from Congress an expression of opinion against the law, that the freedom of speech and of the press might be established by authority as well as argument. He believed that ninety-nine out of an hundred deemed the law unconstitutional. No man would now dare to attempt its renewal; no man would thus expose his head and his character to the imprecations and reproaches he would draw upon himself. But shall we leave the law, and decisions under it, for future example and precedent? He was for banishing them from our records; he was for making amends, as far as possible, for the violation of our Constitution. The sum in controversy was small, very small, indeed, to the nation, though something to a poor individual; but, small as it was, it had created great alarm in the mind of the gentleman from New Hampshire, lest, if it was refunded, the widows and orphans of the late war would be deprived of the aid of Government, and left to suffer! The gentleman need not, he thought, be alarmed. The finer under the sedition law were not numerous, and their amount was small. Mr. Jefferson had remitted Callender's fine, and this was high authority for us. Congress had acted on the same principle in a great variety of cases—on the application of General Brown, and many others. Was this considered a stigma on the judiciary? Yet the principle was precisely the same. The law was unconstitutional, and we ought to restore all the money taken under it. We have the power to repair as well as to violate. No branch of the Government is infallible, and, when we do wrong, we ought to repair it; and we ought to erect some barrier against future injurious and unconstitutional action on this subject. Mr. C. apologized for having occupied the attention of the Senate so long.

Mr. OTIS said he should not enter into the argument of the question; but would merely suggest a fact which he had before omitted. He believed the people of the United States had never demonstrated their opinion that the sedition law was unconstitutional. After the Virginia Legislature had passed their resolutions, denouncing this law, and circulars enclosing their proceedings were sent to the Legislatures of the several States, those of New England unanimously declined expressing their disapprobation of the law, and so far gave their sanction to it. Virginia again took up the subject, and gave a comprehensive view of all the arguments against the law; and this was carried through the Legislature but by about two to one. He thought at least one-half of the people of the United States might be considered as having expressed their opinion that the law was Constitutional; yet, he would not at this time so far outrage public opinion as to vote for a renewal of this law. He hoped it might be done without; but it might have to be recurred to in times of imminent public danger. A crisis might arrive, when it would not be safe to let the press denounce the President of the United States as an usurper and highwayman, and the Congress as swindlers, and participators in his plunder; and to declare that the people had no resource but in a convention of delegates.

Mr. SMITH asked leave to explain. His friend from Kentucky had misconceived him. He had never been an admirer of the sedition law—he liked it as little as any other person. He had not said it was deemed Constitutional in South Carolina; he did not know that this was a fact. But he thought, if it were passed now, little alarm would be excited, and little said against it. He feared he was also misunderstood respecting the judiciary; he did not deem them infallible, but they were the proper expositors of the law. If they did wrong, they were impeachable. Congress were unauthorized to give laws a construction. As a sound lawyer, he would appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky, if any such authority existed; he could point to none. Popular opinion was, nine times out of ten, right; but, when called on to give a vote, he must consult his own judgment. He went on the ground that Congress had no cognizance of the case, and that the consequences of interfering, would be injurious to the country.

Mr. MORRIL made a few remarks in explanation. He was not in favor of sedition laws, nor did he think that law was expedient. But he believed it was Constitutional, and that the present resolution was inexpedient and unnecessary.

The question was taken on Mr. CRITTENDEN's proposition, and decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays, 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Crittenden, Edwards, Epes, Forsyth, Lacock, Macon, Morrow, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Talbot, Thomas, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Fromentin, Gailard, Hanson, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Mellen, Morrill, Noble, Otis, Smith, Storer, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

The report of the Committee was then concurred in—yeas 20.

GENERAL JOHN STARK.

The Senate proceeded again to the consideration of the bill for the relief of General Stark, an amendment having been heretofore agreed to, on motion of Mr. TICHENOR, to change the commencement of the pension from the 4th of July, 1817, to the 16th of August, (the anniversary of the battle of Bennington, in which General Stark so greatly signalized himself,) and the question was on ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. ROBERTS commenced a brief debate on the bill, by objecting to its passage, though under the highest sense of General Stark's merits, on the general ground of being adverse to a system of pensions, when not justified by disability incurred in the public service; that, if a pension were granted in this case, the same argument would justify pensions in numerous other cases; and because, in this instance, the relief was not solicited by General Stark himself, but by others for him.

Mr. FROMENTIN replied to Mr. ROBERTS, and advocated the bill with much earnestness, remarking, in substance, that he would act on this single case, without extending his views to other possible cases to which his attention was not called; that the very silence of General Stark was the most eloquent appeal he could possibly make for support, because age and infirmity had rendered him incapable of making his own petition; that, on the score of expense, there was little to apprehend on that account; for, so far from the probability that General Stark would be a burden to the Treasury, there was danger that, ere the present bill could receive the approbation necessary to make it a law, the object of it (now ninety odd years of age) would have descended to the tomb, as was almost the fact in the case of General St. Clair, who did not enjoy his pension more than three months, when he became a tenant of the grave.

Mr. KING rose merely to remark that, if the Senate were composed altogether of men of his age, he believed there would not be a dissenting voice heard against the bill; because they would all have then, as he had, personal recollection of the singular and extraordinary Revolutionary services of General Stark. Mr. K. mentioned, as particular examples, the unrivalled conduct and services of General Stark at the battle of Bunker Hill; his subsequent success in arresting the triumphant progress of Burgoyne; the feelings of joy and encouragement in the cause, which were diffused throughout all the northern section of the States, by the achievements and success of Stark, and which, if every member were old enough to remember, as he did, there would, he repeated, be not a solitary objection to this bill.

Mr. SMITH followed in opposition to the bill. He argued, in reply to its advocates, that, if General Stark was so near his end as was represented, there was the less necessity for this bill, because he could not live to enjoy it, and the doctrine was long since exploded that a man had use for money after his decease—passage-money was no longer deemed necessary. If it was for relief, it was unnecessary; but, if it was intended as a compliment, that was another question. In either view he was opposed to it. Mr. S. denied the power of giving pensions for the purpose of distinction, and he had therefore never given his assent to any pension not previously provided for by law. He did by no means deny the great merits of General Stark; but this being another case in the improper system of pensions, now becoming common, he was opposed to it, and hoped it would not pass.

Mr. MORRIL made a few remarks in reply to some of the observations made by gentlemen on this subject, when before under consideration, and added a few words on the uncommon merits of General Stark—briefly noticing his gallant conduct at Bunker Hill, at Bennington, at Trenton, at Princeton, &c., adducing the voluntary letters of compliment from Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, respectively, on their succeeding to the Presidency, and concluded by saying, that if merit was to be estimated by services rendered to one's country, there was none so deserving as the veteran hero the Senate was now called on to relieve from penury.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burrill, Crittenden, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Forsyth, Fromentin, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Otis, Palmer, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson—29.

The report and resolution were read, and agreed to.

Mr. TAIT, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to enable the people of the Alabama Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. WILSON, of New Jersey, rose to offer a resolution. He observed that the resolution he was about to submit required a few words of explanation. The traffic in slaves and servants of color had been carried on to considerable extent from the State of New Jersey; and, under color of this traffic, it was believed many free persons, or who were soon to become free, had been consigned to slavery for life. The Legislature of New Jersey, at its late session, had unanimously passed a law to prevent this traffic; but it was feared this law could not be carried into complete effect, without the co-operation of the revenue officers of the United States, authorized by an act of Congress. The Legislature had therefore instructed their Senators, and requested their Representatives in Congress, to use their endeavors to procure the passing of an act to prevent the transportation of slaves, or servants of color, from any State to any other part of the United States, in cases where, by the laws of such State, such transportation is prohibited. In conformity with these instructions, as well as agreeably to his own feelings and principles, he therefore begged leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the subject of the slave trade be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, "to prevent the transportation of slaves, or servants of color, from any one State to any other part of the United States, in cases where, by the laws of such State, such transportation is prohibited."

Mr. MORRIS submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be requested to inquire into the expediency of making some further provision, by law, for preventing and extinguishing fires, which may happen in this city.

Resolved, That the Message of the President, and documents, relative to the Seminole war, be referred to a select committee, who shall have authority, if necessary, to send for persons and papers: that said committee inquire relative to the advance of the United States troops into West Florida; whether the officers in command at Pensacola and St. Marks were amenable to, and under the control of Spain; and, particularly, what circumstances existed, to authorize or justify the Commanding General in taking possession of those posts.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COURTS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, and the appointment of circuit judges; and, the question recurring on the following motion submitted by Mr. BARBOUR:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the committee that brought it in, with instructions so to amend it as to abolish the circuit courts, and transfer their jurisdiction to the district courts, to authorize an appeal directly from such courts, to the Supreme Court, and enlarge the right of appeal, by reducing the amount on which the right may be exercised."

Mr. BARBOUR addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I entirely agree with the friends of the bill, that a change in our judicial system is necessary: so far, at least, as will relieve the judges of the Supreme Court from traversing the widely extended territory of the United States. The truth is, we require of them to perform duties which are highly incompatible. In a judge of the Supreme Court, we look for a capacity and a character which belong only to one advanced in life; and yet we exact a service, of some of them at least, which can be performed only by youth and a robust constitution. For example, we require a judge to traverse the States of Ohio, and Tennessee, and Kentucky, twice a year, and his attendance also at Washington in the depth of Winter. The history of the appointments to that high station will justify me in the above remark, viz., that none but men considerably advanced in life have received the appointment; and we are, therefore, justifiable in concluding, that none others will be appointed. If, which is also a fair calculation, they should continue on the bench till they become infirm, the incompatibility of their duties will become the more palpable, by their utter incapacity to perform them. In addition to this difficulty, I would suggest another, that, even now, we are told they are compelled to adjourn the Supreme Court before the business is disposed of, for the purpose of attending their respective circuits. Thus their docket, instead of diminishing, continually increases; an evil of no ordinary magnitude; for all experience evinces that a tardy administration of justice aggravates litigation.

To remedy this serious inconvenience, not to say great evil, is an object deserving of the wisdom of Congress. But, in the attempt, let us not produce a greater: let us not subject ourselves to an alarming increase of judges and the consequent expense, which the bill, if it pass, must produce. The course I have had the honor of proposing will remedy the one evil, and avoid the other. By my plan, I confine the judges of the Supreme Court to the duties of that court exclusively; and, by preserving the districts, a federal jurisdiction is carried, without inconvenience to the judge, and without expense to the Government, to every State; and, where large, to different districts in the same State. As, for instance, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia—it being now proposed to divide Virginia. It has been objected to my plan, that, from the duties of the judge of the district court, he should always be at the place of holding his court. The answer to that objection is readily furnished, by the fact, that he does not now even reside at the place of holding his court. The truth is, that, in some of the States, they hold their courts at different places; and, besides, are co-ordinate members of the circuit court; so that, in giving them circuit jurisdiction, the only change in the system would be, to deprive them of the aid of the judge of the Supreme Court. Besides, when called on to act judicially, the case being always on record, though he should not be present, yet the facility and rapidity of communication by mail removes, if not time, at least space, and, in effect, gives him the attribute of ubiquity. It is objected, that the judges of the district court were appointed with no view to the important duties which this bill devolves upon them, and, therefore, that they are incompetent. In the first place, the fact is not true; because they were at all times associate judges of the circuit court, and had heretofore the precise duties to perform that will be now assigned them. And, secondly, I deny their incompetency; for, as far as my knowledge extends, which I am free to admit is limited to Virginia, the gentleman who holds that station there ranks, in point of reputation, with the most distinguished legal characters in the United States. It is said, however, that it is too high a trust to devolve on a single judge the cognizance of criminal trials involving capital punishments. Sir, on that subject, I at least can have no apprehension; because, in Virginia, the criminal justice of the whole State is administered by a single judge to each criminal court. This has been the case for a number of years; and yet I have never heard, in a solitary instance, of even a murmur of complaint that any man has been improperly punished. The fact is, in criminal trials in this country, the judge rather sits to preserve order than to take part in the trial. The great security of innocence, without meaning any disparagement of the judges, is to be found in the grand jury and the jury of the vicinage. The latter, I have ever thought, and in and out of this place have declared it, the happiest effort of the human mind; and that to this institution, and a free and enlightened press, under Providence, would our liberty be indebted for the immortality of its duration. Far from regretting the extinction of the circuit courts, I doubt whether it will not be an advantage. You rid suitors of the necessity of multiplied appeals. In the event of a case of great importance, and of a doubtful nature, the unsuccessful party will be as little satisfied with the judgment of the circuit court as of the district court. They will be content only with the decision of the court of the last resort; and going through the circuit will be attended with no other consequence than a loss of time and an accumulation of costs. The very right to appeal will, most generally, supersede the necessity of resorting to it. The judge, should such a monster ever appear on our bench, who would be otherwise corruptly disposed, would lose all temptation to commit iniquity, as the rod of correction, through the right of appeal, would be continually brandished over his head; and a remedy, by this right, at all times within reach of the party aggrieved. Sir, in a measure so important as this, it behooves Congress to advance with extreme caution and circumspection. This scene has already been acted in the United States. The sixteen, by some called the midnight judges, were created only to be destroyed. What a spectacle are we about to exhibit to the people of the United States! Your predecessors in power, some seventeen or eighteen years past, made a similar experiment; differing in nothing from this except in extent; and if this should obtain, in a few revolving years we need have no cause to doubt but that, in this regard, the resemblance will be complete. What was the result? The people spoke out; and, in defiance of the charge that the repeal of the law was unconstitutional, and in defiance of the threats of one State, Delaware, of its high displeasure at your proceedings, the law, and the judges with it, passed away. This took place in the commencement of your career, when you reflected the image of the public sentiment. If now you revive the system then so strongly reprobated, and for whose destruction you received such deserved commendation, what will be said of you? That you were dissatisfied, not with the law itself, nor yet the offices which it created, but because you were excluded from all participation in the benefits thereof.

Although I readily and cheerfully exempt every gentleman here from any such motive, yet I am at a loss to conceive what apology can be assigned for this capricious and changeable course. Is it pretended, sir, that the business in these courts (I mean the circuit) has increased? I affirm, from all that I have heard, (for I am no lawyer,) that it has diminished. It is true, sir, that during our restrictive system, when disloyalty and cunning sought to elude and destroy its salutary effects, the business of these courts might have increased; but, upon the restoration of peace, and the re-establishment of our accustomed relations, this source of litigation dried up, and business everywhere diminished, except in the two States of Kentucky and Tennessee, which will be hereafter satisfactorily accounted for. If this be not a correct statement of the fact, let it be corrected by those who are better advised. But, sir, is it not a little remarkable, when so great a change as the present is proposed, we have been furnished with no official documents (the dockets of the respective courts, for instance) to ascertain to us the extent of the business therein depending, so that we might have something sure to stand on? I am, therefore, at liberty to contend, till the contrary appears, and by evidence of record, that the business has diminished, with the exception alone of Tennessee and Kentucky. The state of the business there results from causes peculiar to those two States. The suits depending in the courts of those States, said to amount to several hundred, result from conflicting land claims. The States of Virginia and North Carolina, of which they were once parts, in the disposition of their waste lands, permitted a mode of appropriation which not unfrequently produced from two to ten (perhaps more) claims for the same portion of soil—as it granted to every applicant a patent, if its emanation were not contested. To adjust these conflicting claims, is the great source of litigation in the courts of those States. But, thanks to the superior wisdom of Congress, resulting from the experience, and warned by the disastrous consequences of the course adopted by Virginia and North Carolina, no such result can occur in the States whose soil was disposed of by Congress. Its division into ranges, townships, and sections, and even quarter sections, places all land claims upon the footing of mathematical certainty, and excludes the possibility of a contest between different patentees. How indefensible, therefore, is this plan, which goes to a modification of the whole judicial system of the United States, by which the number of judges is most unreasonably increased, when it is not pretended that an evil of the same kind exists elsewhere, and when, by the plan I propose, the remedy may be applied precisely and exclusively to the evil complained of. There is one consideration which I cannot forbear to advert to, and which I think entitled to some, if not to considerable weight; and that is, if, upon experiment, the plan I propose should prove defective, it may be easily remedied—on the contrary, should the bill, in its present shape, become a law, although you should find that your new judges should have little or nothing to do, and thereby become sinecures, yet the good people of the United States are remediless; for I know not by what process you are to get clear of them.

In questions of great importance, it will become us to recur to just principles; and, where doubt and difficulty exist, to take the spirit of the Constitution, and the origin of its existence, as our guide. Sir, the Federal Government owes its birth to purposes exclusively international. The States designed to retain to themselves whatever was internal or municipal. The Federal courts, in their jurisdiction, should be limited to the just spirit of the Constitution—to subjects external or foreign in their nature, while the State courts should exercise unlimited jurisdiction upon all other subjects. I would, therefore, erect no federal court but what was absolutely necessary: such I consider the supreme and district courts—the circuit courts are not. I do not like the policy of erecting federal tribunals, not necessarily called for, but whose effect will be to draw off subjects of legislation from the State courts, where they ought to be adjudicated.

When we advert to the progress of the courts in the country to which we generally refer for lessons of experience, it is not an idle apprehension we express, when we say we are fearful lest these federal tribunals will go on, gradually, to draw within their cognizance, by fictions, which they so easily glide into, the whole range of judicial authority. The courts of the States, being abandoned, will be considered as an unnecessary burden, and their entire extinction will be an easy and natural death. Comparing great things with small, permit me to say, the very consequence against which I am warning you, is already occurring in Virginia. The county courts in that State, were long the favorite object of our policy. I thought them, and still think them, the best part of our judicial system. The persons who compose those courts, are our most respectable citizens; they serve without any reward; their motive is disinterested patriotism, and may, without a figure, be called the salt of the land; their jurisdiction, both in common law cases and in equity, was unlimited. Some few years since, however, a superior court, composed of one judge of the general court, was sent to every county; and I learn, and it is with deep regret, that a policy has been uniformly pursued since, to give these superior courts something to do, by continually encroaching on the county courts; or, by some means or other, withdrawing the business from the county courts—while chancery courts are extending themselves in every direction, so as to absorb the whole of their equitable jurisdiction. It requires no spirit of prophecy to foretell the probable result. The intelligent and patriotic citizen will withdraw himself from so humble a situation—and, their authority falling into unworthy hands, they will become contemptible, and hence lose all value. And such, I fear, will be the progress of the Federal courts in relation to the State courts. The old adage, that the big fish eat the little ones, will apply with as much force to the moral as the physical world. In fine, the result of my best reflections upon this interesting subject, is, that we are bound to reject this bill, whether we are governed by a regard to economy or policy. We are called upon, by the bill, to multiply judges, while their business is diminishing, except in a small portion of the United States, where causes of a peculiar kind have existed, but from their nature are transient, and in so far to violate every consideration of economy, which, in the consideration of this question, is entitled to particular regard, as our judicial system is the most expensive in the world, not excepting England, whose prodigality is proverbial: it results, in part from our singular Government—the necessity of keeping up two distinct systems. If we comprehend the justices of the peace, the judges of the Supreme Court, of the general court, of the court of appeals, of the judges in chancery, in the States, and our district and supreme judges, in the Federal courts, we may fairly set down the number of from ten to fifteen thousand persons, who are engaged in dispensing justice to the people of the United States. Add to this, though not entirely relevant to the question, that we have this day not less than three thousand legislators engaged in framing laws for their government, and the host of Executive officers, from the President down to the lowest Executive subaltern, and we are presented with a number of public officers, that is truly prodigious. It is not only the money they cost us—a subject, however, of serious amount—but it is the diversion of such a mass of intelligence from productive and beneficial pursuits, that constitutes, with me, the greatest objection. To limit the number as much as is practicable, is therefore desirable. But, in point of policy, the objection to this bill, in its present form, rests on considerations still more important: it is protruding the sphere of Federal authority so as to infringe on that of the States; the sequel of which collision, according to the universal law to which all human things are subject, must be the injury of the latter, as being the weaker.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COURTS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, and the appointment of circuit judges; and,

On the question to agree to the following motion submitted yesterday, by Mr. ROBERTS:

"That the bill be recommitted to the committee who reported it, with instructions to provide, in lieu of the provisions of the bill, for the appointment of two additional district judges in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, who with the district judges, now in commission, shall hold the circuit court in those States, with the jurisdiction those courts now exercise."

Mr. ROBERTS said, that, in the good temper (which it was not his intention to disturb) that had for some time happily prevailed, he was at first undecided as to whether he should eventually vote for the bill or not. Seeing around him so many learned and experienced jurists, he had waited to be enlightened by them. He found they held different opinions, and that it became his duty to decide on the best view of the case he could obtain. The proposition and argument of his friend from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) had opened in his mind interesting views; and his call for the necessity of the proposed extension of the judiciary establishment had not been responded to satisfactorily by the supporters of the bill. The proposition of the committee having been matured to their satisfaction, his best reflection had resulted in a settled conviction that it ought not to pass. Willing, however, to extend to others the indulgence the Congress had lately extended to his own State, he had felt it not enough to object to the bill; he had also offered a substitute. On a former day, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. OTIS) had intimated, pretty distinctly, that he understood the Republican party to have resorted to all the measures they had condemned in their predecessors, save only that they had not passed a sedition law. He was glad the gentleman had not adjudged them to have violated the Constitution. He hoped also the gentleman would hold them acquitted of having as yet sanctioned a law creating a host of useless judges. That had been one of the things which the gentleman's party stood charged with, and one that had received as strong a stamp of reprobation as the sedition law; with this difference, that while the latter had been modified, in its enactment, to disappear with the party whose measure it was, the former had been repealed after perhaps one of the most copious and elaborate discussions any question ever had in Congress. Mr. R. remarked, he was one of those who had always believed there was an essential difference in the principles of the two parties, that have long divided political opinion in our country. What was wrong formerly, circumstances not changed, must be wrong still.

He was not ready to admit that the course of the two parties, while in authority, had been identified in everything but a sedition law. It was not necessary to show, though he believed it might be successfully shown, that there were few acts of the Republican party which were not entirely consistent with the tenets they held. At no time has a Republican Legislature, or a Republican Executive, shown any willingness to create or retain useless officers. It was, he said, by recurring to this principle, that he felt so strong a repugnance to this bill, inasmuch as it not only extended, unnecessarily, offices, but of such kind as were more permanent than any others. When gentlemen have been desired to show the necessity for this, and why the district judges may not hold the circuit courts, the reply has been a sort of admission that they are not competent, being chosen for different purposes. Yet these very judges are to form an equal part of the new benches. There was, he knew, an impression around him that he was not penetrated with due respect for the judicial character. As for the existing judges, he thought them, collectively, as able and virtuous men as we can reasonably hope to get. He could not, however, hold them in such respect as to sanction the principle on which they hold their offices. The truth is, the Constitution is, in this regard, essentially vicious. It is a principle falsified by the nature of man. A tenure in office of good behaviour must be held in derogation of the fact, that man is liable to frailty and decay. This will attend the judge as well as the representative; and that Constitution is anomalous and defective which does not provide a remedy for the evil in both cases.

The gentlemen favorable to the bill admit the district judges are not competent to hold the circuit courts, not so much from their want of numbers as from their not having been selected with a view to perform those duties. It will be obvious, said Mr. R., that the duties of the district judges, as established by law, are of quite as important a character as those that would devolve on them as circuit judges. It will, he said, be found to be a fact, that we are only beginning to experience the evils of the tenure of good behaviour. Our Government has existed about thirty years, and many of the district judges which have been appointed were in the vigor of life, and are only now advancing far into the shades of the evening; the inefficiency of age, it seems, is overtaking them; their courts have fallen into disesteem, and we are called upon to prop them up by corps of new creation. Gentlemen have not attempted to show there is any exigency in our jurisprudence, except in a single section of the Union. There it must obviously be temporary. The conflicting grants of land in Kentucky and Tennessee must terminate, even by course of time alone, though it is admitted this remedy would be entirely intolerable. Mr. R. said he was willing to provide efficient tribunals for their adjustment: the motion submitted would reach that object. He was not willing, however, in doing so much, to create judges throughout the Union because one or two were wanted in one section. It would seem to be aggravating the evil we now feel, instead of curing it, the tenure of office being as it is. We have no security we shall get better men than those who hold the district courts; and they must decay, like those who have gone before them. The Constitution is defective, and requires amendment; and it must eventually obtain.—While, however, it remains as it is, it would seem wisdom not to multiply judges unnecessarily. Experience has proved we have no remedy against frailty in a judge, short of misdemeanor, but by impeachment. Trial has proved this almost worse than none. What we have seen in this way was not very strong proof that the tenure of the judge's office was founded in wisdom and truth. An instance had occurred where the judge had become so odious that difficulty occurred in finding him a location for the exercise of his office. There is certainly difficulty, and it is almost insuperable, in getting rid of a bad judge. Let us take care how we make them without necessity. "A breath can make them!" but it cannot unmake them; such a task will require the utmost effort of our Government.

Organization of the Courts.

SENATE.

It had been urged strongly, on a former day, that, to refund a fine inflicted by a decision of a court, would attach reproach to the sanctity of such a decision. Having on many occasions since he had a seat in the Senate, Mr. R. said, discovered an overweening disposition in some gentlemen to sanctify the Judicial branch of the Government—a spirit from whence he deemed arose the erroneous principle of a tenure in office of good behaviour—he was led to advert to the nature of the judge's office. It is a common phrase to call the Judiciary a co-ordinate branch of the Government: the metaphor is too strong. Surely, gentlemen will not soberly contend it is of equal authority with the Legislative or Executive branches, by whom it is quickened into life, governed, supported, and preserved. The notion of equality will not bear the touch of inquiry. It was, he granted, an important and independent branch of the Government, constitutionally, and made so wisely. But the bench of judges are not the Judiciary. The judicial power is to be vested in a Supreme Court and other courts; not in the judges only, but in the judges, jury, and other officers. The judges are the only officers who have a tenure of office of good behaviour; and in this they were, he admitted, especially distinguished, for it forms them into a species of privileged order. Notwithstanding this, however, all the sanctity that art could raise around them could never swell them into a comparison, as to authority, with the other branches of the Government. The nature of their functions determines their importance. It is impossible for so few men, however learned, virtuous, and capable, who are doomed to sit in obscurity, to distribute justice and administer law, who are seen by few, and whose affected importance is felt by still fewer, to hold rank with the Congress and with the President. Mr. R. inferred the feature of the Constitution he was objecting to had been derived from that country whence we had sprang; which country, by a measurable application of the rules of common sense, had realized many truths in the judicial science. They had however been extorted from the abominable heresy that the King is the fountain of honor, justice, and power. At first the written laws were obtained from him by supplication and prayer. He was held to be the sole dispenser of justice, but, as he had not the attribute of ubiquity, it became necessary to adjudicate by deputy. These deputies or judges, being emanations of royal authority, shared its sanctity and partook of its inviolability. It was certainly a great point to dissolve the dependence of the judge on the King; and hence the value of the judge's independence, as it is understood in England. Setting out from a wrong point, it is not easy to arrive at a right one. The English tenure of judicial office becomes a horrible deformity in a free constitution, like ours. Those who preside over the administration of distributive justice ought everywhere to be independent of every sort of influence from the other branches of the Government, except the fear of punishment for wrong doing. Misconduct in a judge ought to be punished as certainly as in any other person. The only cure for evils incident to such a state of things is to apply to it the corrective principles applied to the other branches of Government—a periodical limitation of office. In these free strictures, he wished to be understood as neither wanting veneration for the Constitution nor respect for the Judiciary. The Constitution had been amended in the articles touching the administration of justice already. These amendments were of vital importance. While it proves that originally it was imperfect, it justifies the conclusion that its imperfections are not all cured. Every day adds new proofs that the judge's tenure of office is most egregiously erroneous. The Constitution of the United States was only designed to make them a community for specific general purposes, leaving to the States every attribute of local sovereignty not expressly delegated to the General Government. Such a scheme must necessarily comprehend a Judiciary branch. The laws must be enforced, and rights arising out of the general concerns require adjudication. The jurisdiction of the United States courts was at first narrow, in regard to the principle of distributive justice. Amendments have made it narrower. It was once a favorite idea with some to make States a party in these courts at the suits of individuals. On the first trial it was abandoned, and the functions of the court suspended while the suit was yet pending. This fact, taken in connexion with the repeal of the law of 1800, proves pretty strongly there has been no undue partiality for the Federal courts heretofore. It is not shown, after the strongest calls on gentlemen, that the bill is necessary from any existing business. It is within the knowledge of all, that there are much fewer actions in the courts of the maritime States than during the times of the restrictive system. That business is principally disposed of, and the only difficulty alleged is the land controversies in Kentucky and Tennessee. For this, said Mr. R., the resolution makes ample provision. Gentlemen have declined attempting to show their measure is founded upon any business the courts now have before them. What were the facts in the State he in part represented? Business like that existing in Kentucky and Tennessee, also existed in the western section of Pennsylvania. An additional district court—the judge having circuit court powers—was asked for, and the Congress were so liberal as to grant the request, for which she is grateful. The calls of justice, we may hope, will be met by this provision, as far as they were designed to be. Mr. R. said he felt a perfect willingness to extend the same benefits to other States, where they were needed. A bill is now on our files providing salaries for the clerk and marshal of the western and the clerk of the eastern district. The fees in these offices are those of the highest State courts, and they have, beside, the fees for recording copy rights. There can be no question that the business has lessened. It has a strange appearance to be providing salaries for marshals and clerks at the same time you are multiplying your judges. Evil may be apprehended from a too great facility in the Federal courts for business. Every man who may be made a judge may not be willing to exercise the authority of opening and adjourning the courts, without any other display of power. The history of courts, said Mr. R., will show they have an appetite, like others in authority, to extend their jurisdiction. We see in the country whence we derive much of our forms of jurisprudence courts, established for entirely different objects, have found means to get cognizance of all kinds of actions, by the resort to the most absurd and monstrous fictions. We have felt something like this in Pennsylvania; in which case the United States courts seemed to get round the Constitution, which denies to them the power of making a State a party at the suit of an individual, by no very conclusive train of reasoning. By their decree, money was in effect extorted from the State treasury, contrary to the Federal and State Constitutions. The resistance made by the State to this strange decree was artfully coupled and classed, for party purposes, with the resistance to the acts of Congress in another quarter. This two-fold injury was suffered to pass off here without explanation; but it sunk deep into the feelings of the State, who knows her duties, and who will not easily forget her wrongs.

Now, let us compare this bill with that of 1801, a law stamped with indelible features of public disapprobation. If there was any difference, it was in favor of that project. There was then six, there is now to be nine circuits. There was then sixteen, there is now to be nine judges. The expense was then thirty-two thousand dollars, now it is to be twenty-three thousand dollars per year. Then you had a bench of those judges, placed on a rational equality; now there is to be two numerically, but one is to give judgment, disregarding the other if he differs in opinion, though he may be the abler and the better man. The repeal of the former judiciary law, and the abolishment of the judge's office, was one of the strongest acts of legislation which has appeared in our history. It was solidly based on the public voice. It was then held to be unnecessary and mischievous. It was viewed as the last act of a system of measures to give an efficiency to the Government, that was deemed to derogate from and endanger the rights of the citizen. When the sentence of condemnation was about to pass, the sanctity and inviolability of the judge, and his tenure of office, was rung through all the changes to no purpose. What was taken then as so wrong, cannot now be right, circumstances not changed; and he was bold to say, there was no new necessity for the measure.

The bill is recommended as introducing symmetry and consistency into our judicial system; and yet, on the very front of it, two judges of the Supreme Court are hung up as useless sinecures. It confesses they will be useless and unnecessary. It is invidious as to the judges themselves, though the reproach may rest among the whole, rather than on any two of them. On the superior bench there must be useless judges; on that of the circuit court there is no equality of character, nor respectability. There is much less irregularity in the present system, and even that of 1801 was less objectionable. The circuit court is only intended to sit twice in a year in the plan before us; if there was really an accumulation of business, they ought to be required to sit until they had really disposed of it. I need not advert to the manner the docket will be settled in such a system. One court must follow the other in so quick a succession, that, in sitting twice a year only, justice must be unavoidably delayed.

On the other hand, the proposition submitted as a substitute offers an efficient court in the only places where it is pretended there is any call for a more adequate administration of justice. Two judges only are required instead of nine, at an annual expense of five, instead of more than twenty-two thousand dollars per annum. It contains no new or doubtful principle; it is in exact conformity with those with which we are familiarized. It may be enlarged as the calls of justice shall require. It does really seem to be all that is incumbent on the Congress to provide, and we may hope the gentlemen from Kentucky and Tennessee will meet it in the spirit it has been proposed, to obtain for their country an administration of justice, without sale, denial, delay. Mr. R. said he was led the more to hope for a favorable reception of his motion, as it admitted of prompt application. He would ask gentlemen, was it reasonable to expect this bill to pass in time to give the President an opportunity of a judicious selection of the judges? Under any circumstances it would impose on him a most arduous duty, and his embarrassment must be increased from the rival pretensions of the States to have the judges. Judge, said he, by the course of the observations I am offering, how much time must pass away, before it could obtain the sanction of both Houses. If it pass at all, it would seem to me indispensable to postpone its operation until beyond the meeting of the Senate, at the future session. By a modification of the bill, its passage would be facilitated and insured. The most prompt operation of it can be had—selections of the most efficient men can be made without difficulty. If, however, the wisdom of the Senate should decide in favor of the bill, and he had no reason to feel surprise if they should, after the failure of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARNES,) and it should become a law, he should yield to the decision, as it was his duty to do. But in such an event, he should feel called upon to exert his feeble efforts to have the Constitution so amended as to obtain some remedy against the burden of a host of superannuated judges.

He would greatly prefer, however, to forbear to change that instrument while its defects were tolerable. He would rather see it as it was, obtain the sanction of time, and he was not even disposed to perfect its more dubious features hastily. If the unnecessary increase of a description of officers, whom we must take for better or worse, in sickness and in health, can be avoided, and who, when made, must be incumbent on the public Treasury, in endless succession, the deformity of a tenure of office during good behaviour, not being so palpably felt, may not so soon be considered insupportable. But, if a system of judicial benefices is to increase without necessity, the time will have arrived when the office ought to be held by a less secure and more useful tenure; it will devolve a duty on us to attempt a remedy by an amendment of the Constitution.

CLOTHING THE ARMY IN DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, on the subject of clothing the Army of the United States, in domestic manufactures.

Mr. RUGGLES, of Ohio, submitted a motion to recommit the report, with instructions "to report a bill to authorize and require the Secretary at War, to supply the Army of the United States with clothing of domestic manufacture, in all cases where the same can be procured of suitable quality, and on terms equal (exclusive of the cost of transportation) to that of foreign manufactures."

Mr. RUGGLES said he had introduced the resolution to recommit the bill, under the firmest conviction of its expediency. He believed the time had arrived when a measure of this kind ought to be adopted by the Government. It was a measure of national interest and importance, and ought not to be longer neglected. He said he had expected the report of the committee would have been of a different character, and that provision would have been made by law, at this session, for clothing the Army of the United States in domestic manufactures. The report of the committee, he was sorry to say, had not given that full and detailed view of the subject which had been desirable—they barely report that a preference is now given to domestic manufactures, without showing the nature and extent of that preference. A definite statement, designating what quantity of clothing was of domestic, and what of foreign manufacture, with a comparative view of the quality and prices of each, would have enabled the Senate to have judged with more correctness on the expediency of the measure, than they now possibly can do. But, Mr. R. said, he was so well convinced of the capacity of the manufacturers to supply the demand, and that, too, upon favorable terms, that he had no hesitation on the subject.

The obvious policy of this nation, said Mr. R., is to rely upon its own resources, and become independent of all other nations, in fact as well as theory. All supplies for clothing the Army, and he said he would also include the Navy, ought to be the product of our own soil and industry. This constitutes one item in the system of national policy, that ought not to be overlooked. No money drawn from the Treasury should ever be permitted to pass out of the country, when it could be advantageously expended among our own citizens, for, by so doing, we strengthen others, and weaken ourselves.

Mr. R. said he had no doubt but the Secretary of War was friendly to such a measure, and was desirous of carrying it into effect as far as possible, under the law, as it now stands. But, he said, if he was correctly informed, a greater quantity of foreign cloths were now used in the Army, than domestic: if he was wrong, he hoped the Military Committee would correct him. Whatever course it might have been expedient heretofore to pursue, he believed the time had now arrived when Congress ought to take a decisive course, go the whole length, and exclude every article of foreign manufacture from the supplies of the Army. The measure is highly important, and intimately connected with the great and growing interests of this nation. That every article necessary for clothing the troops can be furnished in the United States, there remains no doubt. The raw materials of wool and cotton are produced in great abundance. By a report from the Commissary General, in 1814, it appears, that the manufacturing establishments had progressed so rapidly, as to be able, even at that time, to furnish every article of clothing necessary for the Army, blankets only excepted. Certainly, then, they are now abundantly competent to meet the demand, and it becomes the duty of the nation to turn their attention to them. Domestic cloths may possibly bear a little higher price, but when their superior quality and durability are taken into consideration, they will be found the cheapest.

This subject should be considered in a two-fold point of view, both as it regards the encouragement of domestic manufactures, and also as it relates to the policy of the nation, by providing in time of peace certain means for clothing the Army in case of future war. If in peace you look to your manufacturers for the necessary articles to clothe your Army, in war they will be ready and competent to supply you, when your supplies from other sources will be rendered precarious, or entirely cut off.

On the subject of encouragement to domestic manufactures, Mr. R. said, there ought to be but one opinion. Their success is identified with the future glory of the nation. Our commerce, navigation, and wealth, are intimately connected with their prosperity. On this subject the will of the Legislature had been twice definitely expressed, and it may now be considered as a fixed and settled rule of policy for this nation. The principle should then be followed up in all its bearings. At the first session of the fourteenth Congress a law was passed, establishing a general tariff of duties on foreign goods imported into the country. With the express view of aiding the manufacturing establishments, a duty of twenty-five per cent. was imposed on all cotton and woollen goods for the term of three years. As a further expression of the national will, the duty of twenty-five per cent. was, at the last session, made permanent for four years longer, making in the whole seven years. So far Congress has done its duty; the measure has met the wishes and expectations of the nation. But, can nothing more be done? Can no other benefits be conferred without prejudice to the public interest? The proposition embraced in the resolution submitted, contemplates other advantages, though it is admitted not of a very extensive character. It is, however, strengthening another link in the great chain of policy that is to elevate the power and wealth of this nation. It may be considered more valuable as a principle connected with our public interest, than as a source of benefit to the manufacturers. The Government makes no sacrifice in adopting it; it only becomes the customer of our own countrymen instead of foreigners, retains the public treasure in the country, encourages productive industry, increases the wealth of the community, and supports a greater proportion of inhabitants. These are objects that ought not to be passed over without notice by a wise Legislature.

Every nation, in the management of its concerns, should adopt a comprehensive system of policy, embracing in its range subjects of a smaller as well as greater interest. Every act of the Government should contribute towards its own prosperity and perpetuation. The nation, said Mr. R., might talk of its boasted independence, but when the melancholy fact is told that it relies upon the industry and skill of other countries for clothing to supply the Army, its degrading dependence is seen and felt. The fact is humiliating. The strong arm of your support and defence becomes enfeebled; protection and security are rendered precarious. The history of the last war furnishes painful evidence of these facts. At the commencement of hostilities, the nation was unprepared, and very deficient in the various articles of clothing, in consequence of which great difficulties occurred during the whole war.

In the Spring of 1812, the present Postmaster General, then Governor of Ohio, was directed by the President of the United States to organize a small army of militia, for the protection of the northwestern frontier. No sooner were the orders issued by the Governor than a sufficient number of the citizens of that State volunteered their services, and, in obedience to orders, rendezvoused at Cincinnati. Among them were farmers, mechanics, and gentlemen of every profession. This little band, the vanguard of your armies in the late war, was composed of the best blood of the State. The zeal and promptitude with which the occasion was met, and the celerity with which they moved to the place of destination, found them, on their arrival at Cincinnati, destitute of blankets necessary for the campaign. The stores could furnish but a limited supply. One resource only was left. Governor Meigs, whose valuable services during the late war will ever be highly appreciated by his country, made an appeal to the liberality and patriotism of the ladies of the town, to supply the soldiers with blankets. The appeal was effectual. The next day several hundred blankets were furnished by them to the Governor, sufficient to supply the wants of his army. This act of female patriotism and devotion to liberty deserves immortality, and history ought to record it as an example for the benefit of posterity.

Mr. R. said, other instances of scarcity and distress might be enumerated, for the want of clothing and blankets during the late war; and the same calamity will continue in all future wars, unless timely exertions are made to obtain them from our own resources. The nation ought to benefit by experience, and profit by past misfortune. It was not until towards the close of the late war that any considerable proportion of the clothing of the Army could be produced by our own country; and this ability to supply was owing to the unparalleled success of the manufactures, which grew out of the war. The nation was then, in a great measure, at the mercy of the enemy—that very enemy with whom our gallant soldiers were contending triumphantly on the banks of the Niagara and the plains of New Orleans.

The time has now arrived when there will be no difficulty or danger in adopting the resolution under consideration. The number of manufactures in operation, and the large amount of capital invested in those establishments, will furnish a supply far beyond the present wants of the Army. There will be sufficient competition in the market to insure a sale at a low and reasonable price; there can be no possible danger from a monopoly. Gentlemen refer to the scenes of the last war—tell us of the manufacturers demanding and receiving an unreasonable price for their cloth—and say, if this measure is adopted, that this nation will again be subject to the same imposition. Mr. R. said he was not disposed to go into a justification of their conduct in this particular, but thus much might be said in their favor: they had done no more than every class of society would have done in a similar situation; it was only the ordinary operation of human nature. The manufacturers converted a capital, formerly employed in commerce, which had been cut up by embargoes, non-intercourse, and war, into those establishments. They partially succeeded during these times, unaided and unassisted by the Government. When war commenced, the pressure of circumstances compelled the Government to look to them for clothing for the Army. The demand was great, and they obtained a price in proportion to the demand. Do not the merchant and agriculturist adopt the same course, and yield to the same principles? When an article is scarce in the market, and the demand considerable, do they not raise the price in proportion to the exigency, regardless of the original cost of the article? If, then, the merchant and the agriculturist adopt precisely the same principle, with respect to the sale of their commodities, is it just to complain of the manufacturers for following the same course?

Your Army at present consists of ten thousand men, scattered over the whole extent of your frontiers. The expense of clothing this army, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, is $400,000. This sum is not large in amount, but it is to be remembered that it relates to the present Peace Establishment. The most favorable time, then, to commence this system of policy, is the present, when the demand is small, and the ability to supply it abundant. Congress may delay this measure for one, two, or three years; but the time will soon come when they will be compelled to adopt it.

Let the Senate remember that this country is not always to remain at peace. If the clouds of misfortune should again gather round the nation; if the dreadful calamities of war should become inevitable, the nation, without a prudent forecast, without a timely preparation, would again be found unprepared for the conflict. Your Army instead of ten thousand, would be swelled to the number of fifty or sixty thousand men; your expenditure for clothing, instead of $400,000 per annum, would probably exceed $2,000,000. It is to prepare for these great events, and large expenditures, Mr. R. said, that he was desirous to commence with zeal and firmness in the proposed system.

It is but proper to inquire what has been the course of other nations on this subject. What have been the means which have led them to power, wealth, and greatness? England furnishes a prominent example. It has been the steadfast policy of that nation not only to encourage manufactures in every possible shape, but also to clothe her armies, navies, and indeed all her people, in domestic fabrics. Edward III. laid the foundation of these principles. Before his reign all the wool in England, except a small quantity manufactured into coarse cloths, was sold to the Flemings, and manufactured by them. The Flemings returned the manufactured cloth, after having had the benefit of its increased value by the manufacture. Edward soon discovered the mistaken policy of the nation, and invited the Flemish weavers to settle in his country. The exportation of wool was prohibited; no foreign cloth could be imported, under pain of forfeiture; an ordinance was passed, that no person in the nation should wear foreign manufactures, the royal family excepted. This encouragement, so decisive and efficacious in its character, gave new life and vigor to productive industry—promoted individual as well as national wealth, and gave a total change to enterprise and commerce. Before the establishment of manufactures, the English carried on but little commerce; they owned but few ships or vessels; every article was brought to them by their more fortunate and enterprising neighbors. Foreigners gathered all the profits arising from a supply of their wants. But, when they changed their policy, what mighty effects were produced! From small beginnings they have become the most great and powerful nation on earth.

There is another consideration that ought not to be overlooked. The present object of the British Government is to render themselves altogether independent of the United States, as regards their customary supplies of cotton. This article is the staple of the South. England at present furnishes a demand for it, and that too at a very high price; but England is using her utmost exertions to obtain her supplies from other countries. She is already furnished with large quantities from her East India possessions—from South America and the West Indies. These sources of supply will be encouraged and cultivated at the expense of the United States. They are already rapidly increasing upon us, and will continue to do so until their competition will seriously affect, and finally destroy, our market in that quarter altogether. If, then, this is the object of Great Britain, and she is hunting out new sources for the raw material, with which to supply her manufactures, it becomes the imperative duty of this Government to adopt such a policy as shall countervail her regulations, and furnish a market at home for the cotton of the South.

Mr. R. said he would not longer detain the Senate on this subject. The view he had taken, he said, was a hasty one, but he believed it was correct. The operation of the principle for which he contended, would be more extensive and more useful than might at first be apprehended. Sustain your manufactures while you have them in existence, and suffer them not to fall and perish through the means of a cold and languid policy. Cherish them as the sources of your wealth, your safety, and power. The purchase of foreign cloths throws the balance of trade against the nation; it is a growing and ruinous calamity. Let the Government, then, as far as possible, break down this destructive system, which is rendering the nation bankrupt, and destroying its healthful energies. Instead of expending $400,000 for the purchase of foreign cloths for the use of the Army, retain it at home—place it in the hands of your own countrymen, and build up your own manufactures. The effects will be beneficial—the example worthy of the nation.

On motion by Mr. TALBOT, the further consideration of the subject was postponed until Friday next.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COURTS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, and the appointment of circuit judges.

Mr. SMITH said, the Senate had been kind enough to indulge him with a postponement of this question, when it was last before them. As he was a member of the committee who reported the bill under consideration, and had entertained a different opinion from the other gentlemen on that committee, as regards the propriety and expediency of this change in the judiciary system of the United States, he would beg leave to offer some remarks upon it.

One prominent ground upon which this change is contemplated, is the immense distance which some of the circuit judges have to travel to the City of Washington. This place is not consecrated to the courts. They can as easily be held at a central point, by which the distance the several judges will have to travel can be better equalized. And he saw no reason why they should be confined there, and compel some of your judges to travel a thousand miles, whilst others did not travel one-tenth of the distance; and this, too, whilst much of your wealth, population, genius, and learning, were going from the worn-out and sterile fields along the Atlantic, and its vicinity, in which Washington itself was included, to inhabit and cultivate the immense tracts of rich and productive lands to the West, from a source whence you may calculate on a considerable portion of your lawsuits to spring.

Sir, the bill before you provides for a supreme court of appeal, to consist of seven judges, until two of the present number shall go off, by death or resignation. It is thought the present number is too unwieldy; that five are a more appropriate number; and it is argued, if you add two more to the present number, the system will be still more unmanageable.

If two are added to take the Western States, as the amendment proposes, all the circuits can be easily attended, and probably seven out of nine, will always attend the Supreme Court. But, if the whole nine should attend, it would appear, sir, that no unfavorable apprehensions ought to be entertained. These judges, whilst they hold their seats under the present system, ought to be practical men. They will be useful in bringing together their aggregate knowledge of the various rules of practice from the different States, and will give that universality to the decisions that is essential to every rule of law. Besides, if anything can be drawn from experience in England, from whence we have derived many of our rules and maxims, we shall find that nine is a moderate number. In England there are twelve judges, all of whom are practical men, attending the circuits, and hearing causes in the first stages, and then associating together to hear them upon review. And in all important cases the twelve judges sit together. The last resort is an appeal to the House of Lords, and when that is the case, in addition to that numerous body of more than one hundred, the twelve judges are usually called in to aid in the decision. This accumulated wisdom is never thought unwieldy in that country.

Mr. S. observed, that one great objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) was the great number of district judges, and their inadequacy to try important cases. Sir, these district judges, if the diminishing system had begun there, would have been much more easily reduced than your circuit judges. The former must either starve or resign, and look for some other employment, unless you make better provision for them than has been heretofore done. Some of the district judges are now doing as arduous duties as your circuit judges, and receive but a thousand or twelve hundred dollars for a salary. If these judges are unequal to the discharge of their duties, the earliest possible measures ought to be adopted to get rid of them, and the system ought to be modified so as to crumble them away, or they ought to be put on a respectable footing, and men appointed, in future, of respectable talents, to whom the public business may be with safety confided. There ought to be no secondary judges. The cause of three hundred dollars is often as important to the parties litigant, as one of a far greater amount is to a rich man. What is justice to a rich man, is justice to a poor man. But the bill now under consideration, does not propose an abolition of the district courts; they are to remain untouched, and the district judges are to sit with the circuit judges; so that the eight circuit judges, to be appointed under this bill, are to be in addition to all the judges, both district and supreme, now existing, and no provision made for lessening the number of district judges in future. The more simple a judiciary system is, the greater are the chances for justice, and the more hope of purity in the system.

Mr. S. said, we had heard that the judges of the Supreme Court were now advancing in life, and ought to be relieved from the duties of the circuit, and left to the more important duties in the supreme court of appeals. He had himself every possible respect for the judges, and, if it appeared that higher salaries were necessary, let them have it. But, heretofore, they had no ground to complain. The salary had been considered, until very lately, an adequate compensation. It was so much so, that, whenever a vacancy happened, there were immediate applications, and a competition for it. There was a time when nature pointed to repose; and it was not to be doubted, unless in rare cases, that, when the body fails, from age and infirmity, the mind becomes enfeebled too; and you have no other mode to test this principle, but by that active course which your judges were obliged to pursue under the present system. If you sit them down at their ease, in the decline of life, they will soon forget the maxims of law, if they should not the grand principles of justice. And the maxims of law are the law, and must be retained by a judge, if you expect to keep the rules of law equal and permanent.

Suppose a judge becomes superannuated; if you take him from his labors he has nothing to admonish him to retire. He, most probably, will be the last man to feel the imbecility of his mind; and how are you to get rid of him? You have already had some experience of this sort. One of your judges became insane, and you had no alternative but to impeach him. Some of the States have had experience of this sort likewise, and have been tortured for expedients to relieve themselves from the infirmities of age and imbecility.

The Senate has heard complaints from no quarter but the Western States. The relief offered by the amendment will be fully sufficient to put them on an equal footing with the other States. This relief to the supreme judges was first brought into view by Mr. President Madison, in his Message to the last Congress during his administration. With every regard for the great political information and experience of that venerable patriot, it is to be recollected he was not a practical lawyer. Borne down, himself, by the fatigues and duties of a life devoted to the public service, and languishing for retirement, he seems to have transferred his feelings to the judges. Such a sympathy was natural, especially in the halcyon days of his Administration. But the life of a judge is a life of labor; it is the character of the station; and whenever he becomes unfit to bear the labors, he becomes unfit to discharge the high duties attached to it. The State of New York has given us a valuable lesson on this subject. It has limited the tenure of office to sixty years. At that age a judge is compelled to retire. Look at their decisions, as given to us in their books of report; they are inferior to none in this country, or perhaps any other in the world. They are the fruits of vigorous minds not yet impaired by age and infirmity.

Sir, in a country like this, it is of some importance that your judges should ride the circuits, not only to become practically acquainted with the different rules that govern the decisions in the different States of the Union, but that they may not forget the genius and temper of their government. Adopt the system now before you, and your supreme judges will be completely cloistered within the City of Washington, and their decisions, instead of emanating from enlarged and liberalized minds, will assume a severe and local character. This will not apply to the honorable gentlemen who now fill your bench with so much ability, but it will result from the system, and from human nature.

The increased duties which are intended to be imposed on the circuit judges, to be appointed under the provisions of this bill, will in nowise render the station of a circuit judge less laborious than what falls to the lot of each of the present circuits, including their travels to Washington, and duties there. Only take a view of the present circuits, and compare them with those that are to be substituted, and the thing will be manifest. So it is only enlarging the number of your judges, without diminishing the duties in the same proportion; and this is contrived by associating the district judges, who have heretofore given general satisfaction alone, with the circuit judges now to be created by this bill.

Mr. S. said, he would now examine into the present system, and see if it employed the judges as constantly as had been alleged. The judges had made no representation of overgrown dockets from any of the Atlantic States. It has been represented by the gentlemen from the Western States, that they must have another judge there, and two are offered them by the amendment. No data had been given upon which you would ground a supposition that the business had recently increased. He had hoped that the resolution offered a few days ago, by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. SANFORD,) would have superseded the bill, for the present at least. The object of that resolution was to obtain, before the next session of Congress, an official return from all the circuit courts in the United States of the number and character of the causes depending in each. This would satisfactorily show the necessity or impropriety of an augmentation of your judges. If the state of the business of the courts did not require it, it would certainly be an incautious policy to make it.

There was one evidence, that there was no great pressure of business, given by the judges themselves. One of them had turned historian, and had written the history of his country in five large volumes, which would redound to his imperishable honor, and the unspeakable advantage of his countrymen. It now adorned the library of every man of science. It is said that Gibbon, the celebrated historian, was incessantly engaged for twenty years in writing the history of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, which is but a little larger than this. Surely, then, the honorable judge could not have been oppressed by the duties of his office, or he could never have found time to have written so elegant and voluminous a work.

But, sir, to come down to the present time, we find the same evidence existing now. It is not a secret in the literary world, that another honorable gentleman of the Supreme Court is now engaged in collecting materials for, and writing the history of, the late General Greene. This is not mentioned as anyhow objectionable on the part of these gentlemen; but, if they have time to indulge in such extensive works of genius and taste, it was an unqualified proof that they had much leisure from their professional duties.

If he could be permitted to compare the State courts to the supreme courts of the United States, he would take the liberty to mention the judiciary of New York. In that extensive State, they had about sixty circuit courts. They had but five judges to do the duties in these courts. The riding of the judges was as extensive as that of any of your supreme judges. You have one court of appeal in the year; the judges of New York hold two courts of appeals in the year. In addition to this, they formed a committee of revision, and, in that character, had to attend a long session of their Legislature every year, and inspect all their bills before they passed into laws. In short, their labors were at least four times as great as that of our supreme judges.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ORRIS) was a member of that Congress which passed the act in 1801, modifying your judiciary pretty much after the manner of the one under consideration. That was a little more enlarged than this. It was then urged that there was an imperious necessity to augment your judges, which was done to the number of sixteen. This was under the Administration of Mr. President Adams. Before the next succeeding session of Congress Mr. Jefferson came into office, and he procured an official statement from all the courts in the United States, of all the causes, of every description, which had been commenced or prosecuted from the commencement of the Government up to November, 1801, including eleven years. The whole of the causes, criminal, civil, and equitable, in all that time, did not amount to nine thousand. And the number of suits commenced in the District of Maine during that eleven years was only nine, and but three of them remained undisposed of. Sixteen additional circuit judges were appointed to aid in this mighty work. More than four thousand causes have appeared on the docket, at one court, in the city of Charleston, which is half the number that were in all the courts of the United States for eleven years; and the judges of the State of South Carolina had twenty-seven circuit courts to attend besides Charleston. This is a fair comparison of labor. However, the succeeding Congress, after a protracted and warm debate, repealed the law, and the new created judges sunk with it. The same honorable gentleman (Mr. O.) has shown an equal zeal upon this occasion; and there is little question but that he is as much mistaken in his calculations now as he was then, if he had the same means to test it.

There was much party spirit displayed in the appointment of the judges, which have been so emphatically called Mr. Adams's midnight judges. He appointed them in the last hours of his Administration, and the whole sixteen of them were Federal. As this office had been created, and as no member of Congress could be appointed to office who had been a member at the time of its enactment, such gentlemen as wanted to go from Congress to a seat in the courts were nominated to be district judges, as that office had been created before, and the district judges which they were appointed to succeed were promoted to circuit judges. Some of those would not accept the promotion, and the offices to which they had been appointed became vacant, of course, and were filled by appointments made by Mr. Jefferson; among which there was not one but what was of the opposite politics. When this system was abrogated, some of the circuit judges, who lost their offices, did not hesitate to accept of the appointment of district judges, and have held the office ever since. This at least proves that all your district judges were not appointed from men of inferior legal learning.

Mr. S. said it was worth while to take a different view of this subject, and to examine if there were not very strong reasons to conclude that your United States courts, and especially those to which you were about to give such an increase of judges, could never have a great deal of business. By the Constitution, their jurisdiction is very limited, except in maritime and admiralty cases; and these were by law exclusively given to the district courts. The district courts also take cognizance of all crimes and offences, where no other punishment than whipping, not exceeding thirty lashes, is inflicted, or where the fine does not exceed one hundred dollars; or where the punishment is by imprisonment, not exceeding six months. This diminishes down the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, in criminal cases, to a mere shadow. The district courts have likewise the exclusive jurisdiction in all cases of seizures by land or on rivers. And the district courts have concurrent jurisdiction in almost every other case, under the limited jurisdiction given by the Constitution to the United States courts.

In addition to this, the Congress have condescended to give by law to the county and State courts, established by the State authorities, only a concurrent jurisdiction in all cases for taxes, for duties, for fines, for penalties, and for forfeitures; and that to any amount. This would show that in this great division and distribution of jurisdiction, there is but very little left for the circuit courts. Besides, in all cases of common law, and there are very few of any other character in the courts of the United States, the courts under State authority have jurisdiction likewise; and very many who might bring their suits in the courts of the United States, prefer the State courts. There is every reason for doing so.

There is generally an earlier decision; and, notwithstanding the distinguished talents employed in the United States courts, there is, perhaps, as much in many of the State courts. Two of the gentlemen that now fill your Supreme Court were taken from the State courts, one from South Carolina and the other from New York. There are many other instances. Judge Rutledge, who was inferior to no man in legal talents, was taken from the State courts of South Carolina by President Washington, and appointed Chief Justice of the United States. His appointment was not confirmed by the Senate, it was true, but it was said to be on account of some political feelings that sprung from his opposition to the Treaty with Great Britain. But he was, nevertheless, a great man, and equal to the discharge of the duties of that high appointment.

Mr. S. said, independent of all these incontrovertible facts, there were other strong circumstances to induce a belief that the causes for litigation were decreasing, and with them litigation itself. In all the old States almost all the titles to lands were now put beyond doubt. They have either been settled in a legal way, or the parties have become more circumspect as regards their land titles, as that property has increased in value. In the new States, and the Territories now settling, the lines were so distinctly marked that they were visible to every man who rode through the woods. And no eluding titles could occur, as they were derived by a sale immediately from the General Government, and did not depend upon the old practice, of every man going into the woods and surveying for himself; and oftentimes two or three surveying the same tract. Your laws are all repealed that imposed internal taxes and duties. No causes can arise from that source.

But, sir, there is another cause more powerful still, and which in the most of cases on contract, and especially in all the cities and towns, and many other places, has almost superseded the courts of law. It is the banks. They are sovereign. Their language is the language of energy. Although they care very little about paying their own debts, and when it becomes necessary they suspend payments in specie, and nobody to say them nay, yet, the very moment the day of grace is past, they send the paper of the best man in the community to a notary public; it is there protested in solemn form, and he is as fast bound as if he was transfixed by a spear. This is now the medium through which merchants collect their debts. They cannot wait the ordinary process of law, and submit to the doctrine of imparlance, a term derived from the Scriptures. This would produce delay. The common law course is tedious throughout. It is not so in the banks; everything must yield to them. There is no more credit given to a merchant, mechanic, or any other person who comes within their sphere, if he is behind with the bank. He is pointed out—he has failed! To avoid this dire calamity, everything must give way. The debtor sells his beds, his plate; his goods are rolled off to the vendues, "and must be sold positively." From all these considerations, he said, he should vote for the amendment, because it presented to his view the most eligible alternative.

Mr. LACOCK said, that he rose to offer his objections on the bill before the Senate under circumstances peculiarly embarrassing and discouraging. The bill had been reported by the Judiciary Committee, composed of gentlemen of the first legal talents in the Senate, perhaps in the Union. For himself he boasted of no such talents; he assumed not the character of a lawyer; he had generally acquiesced in questions of minor importance and mere judicial regulation, in the opinion of those whose pursuits in life gave them a better opportunity of judging than himself. But this was a very different question. It proposed a new organization and modification of the judicial powers of the Government, that vitally affected the interest of the nation. He therefore thought it his duty not to give a silent vote on the occasion, and begged the indulgent ear of the Senate while he attempted to point out what appeared to him radical defects in the system proposed.

Mr. L. said he objected to the bill, in the first place, because, instead of strengthening the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States it weakened it. In the second place, it subjected the judges of that court, by locating them in the City of Washington, to dangerous influences and strong temptations, that might bias their minds and pollute the streams of national justice. These positions, Mr. L. said, he should endeavor to demonstrate. It would be admitted, said Mr. L., that this court possesses powers, legitimately granted by the Constitution, of the most extensive and important character. It had been urged by the chairman of the committee, Mr. BURRILL, as a reason for the passage of the bill, that the business in the courts of the United States had vastly increased, and would continue to increase and magnify in proportion to the increased population and wealth of the nation; and yet, notwithstanding this acknowledged increase of important duties, the bill reported by the committee, that state those facts, proposed to reduce the number of judges from seven to five, thus diminishing at one blow near one third of the mental and legal strength and character of the court. Does this, said Mr. L., appear like improving your system of jurisprudence, and adapting it to the increased exigencies of the nation? But this, said Mr. L., is not the worst feature in this system—you not only propose to diminish the number of judges, but you destroy, or very much, at least, impair the efficiency and usefulness of those who remain on the bench. We are told that these judges are to be men advanced in years, that it is necessary to relieve them from the labor incident to a discharge of their circuit duties in the States, and, therefore, provision must be made for their convenience. I fear, said Mr. L., that gentlemen have consulted more the ease and convenience of the judge than the benefit of the nation, and that this bill will suit the judge better than the people. So soon, said he, as you cut off the judge from his circuit duties you destroy half his worth—it is there his mind is enlightened and his judgment informed—it is the discussions at the bar, the collision and struggle of genius and talents, that elicits the spark that illumines the darkest subject, and discovers the road to a correct decision. Were it not for this the wisest judges would frequently grope their bewildered way in vain, and never arrive at the temple of justice! But this, said he, is not all the advantage derived by judges in the discharge of their circuit duties, particularly in the trial of titles to lands granted under State authorities. To have a knowledge of those cases involved in extreme doubt and difficulty, it is indispensable that the judge should be intimately acquainted, not only with the numerous laws under which the grants are made, but the customs and common law usages of the section of country where the land lies. All those advantages are overlooked and disregarded by the bill before you; and we are called upon to acknowledge and believe that those judges will, when appointed, be put in possession of immaculate purity, of intuitive wisdom, and supernatural intelligence. How else, said he, could you expect them to discharge the duties imposed by this measure? They are to be deprived of the means of obtaining information—every motive or inducement to application, industry, and exertion, is taken away or greatly diminished. Hard thinking was unpleasant and arduous. No man would labor without a pretty strong moral necessity for so doing. Take away that necessity, and the exertion ceases. This bill takes away, said he, the inducement, and the necessity will cease with it, and the laborer be no longer worthy of his hire. These, Mr. L. said, were not mere speculative opinions; they were deductions and results drawn from the character of the creature, man, after analyzing his nature, and discovering the secret springs by which volition and action were produced. They applied to all men in all situations, but most strongly would they be found to operate on the conduct of the judge. He held his office by an almost irresponsible tenure; he was to have an ample independent salary; he was to be located in the City of Washington. Thus, in old age, you invite him to take his ease and comfort; and, my word for it, said Mr. L., you will not be disappointed.

But, said Mr. L., by this organization of your judicial system, the Supreme Court will be the weakest part of the whole establishment. The circuit courts, respectively, and the bar generally, will possess more legal talents, and, of course, weight of character, than the Supreme Court that are to decide in the last resort. Let me not be told, said Mr. L., that every subject will receive a full and fair examination and discussion on its merits in the court. Nothing short of a miracle, said he, under this system could make it so. You will have not only your judges, but your attorneys confined to the City of Washington. The judges are to be old men when appointed, and the infirmities of old age will every day increase, and as the useful and vigorous faculties of their minds diminish, in the same proportion will their obstinacy and vanity increase. Old men are often impatient of contradiction, frequently vain and susceptible of flattery. These weaknesses incident to old age will be discovered and practised upon by the lawyer willing to make the most of his profession, and located in the same city, holding daily and familiar intercourse with the judge. And thus, said Mr. L., your court may become subservient to the Washington bar. The judges, bowed down by the weight of years, will be willing to find a staff to lean upon; and the opinion of the Washington bar is made the law of the land. A knot of attorneys at or near the Seat of Government having gained the ear, and secured the confidence of the court, will banish all competition from abroad.

For the truth of this position, Mr. L. said, he would appeal to the professional gentlemen around him, particularly to those of Kentucky, who seemed anxious to adopt the measure proposed—the adoption of which might deprive that State of the talents and usefulness of a judge on the bench of the Supreme Court, so soon as Judge Todd should leave it. And with what painful reflections and awful forebodings, said Mr. L., would a Kentucky lawyer enter this court? No man that had heard the cause argued at home—no man personally known to him, and on whom he can rely for official integrity, is seen on the bench. Like a stranger in a strange land he feels his situation comfortless and gloomy. He takes his solitary seat at the bar—he views the court as belonging to the same family, and almost identified with the great Crown lawyers that are to oppose him; and thus with fear and trembling he approaches the cause of his client, doubting and half believing that the cause has already been prejudged by the bench, or that the weight and influence of legal talents will stifle the calls of justice; and should an observation drop from the bench during the discussion to confirm his doubts, he abandons, as desperately hopeless, the cause of his client, however just. This, said Mr. L., would be a deplorable state of things. But, said he, adopt this system, (thus subject to abuse,) and the state of things takes place sooner or later. The distributive justice of the nation may be subjected to the control of a combination of Washington lawyers. The inquiry will be by the people, not the merits of the cause pending in court, but what attorneys are employed? Have Mr. Wirt and Mr. Pinkney been secured? If they have, the result cannot be doubted. Mr. L. said he mentioned those gentlemen to illustrate the subject merely, and meant no personal allusion to the gentlemen named. They were upright and honorable men, for whom he felt the highest esteem. Neither did he wish to be understood, in anything he had said or should say, as alluding to the present judges of the Supreme Court. They, too, he believed, were wise, upright, and honorable men, and he wished to keep them so; and not by the adoption of this system to tempt and invite them to be otherwise.

It was, however, Mr. L. said, due to himself to state, that he was not one of those who subscribed to the perfection and infallibility of the judicial character; he had, by long experience, found that judges, and lawyers out of whom they were made, were very much like other folks; he did not believe the profession calculated to make them better; he would be sorry to say they were worse than other men: neither did he believe that taking a man from the usual pursuits of life, or even from the grand councils of the nation, and placing him on the bench of the Supreme Court, was likely to change his character for the better, or that wrapping his limbs in a silken mantle, to excite the gaze and admiration of the ignorant, would add any thing to his stock of legal knowledge, and improve his understanding. The truth is, he would still remain a poor, imperfect, feeble being, clothed with all the infirmities, and liable to all the frailties of human nature. It was the duty, said Mr. L., of the lawgiver to guard society against the abuses of power, wherever it might be lodged. He had endeavored to prove that judges, like other men, were liable to commit errors and crimes, and to abuse the confidence reposed in them. To prevent such abuses, it was necessary to remove the judges as far as possible from every source of political temptation. He did not wish to see the judges imbedded in the city of Washington, another appendage to the Executive authority; he wished them identified with the people of the nation, domiciliated in the different States, and called together as a court in bank as often as the nature of the case required.

It could not be denied, said Mr. L., that there had been, and he supposed always would be, two great political parties in this nation. It is true, said he, it is said this is the era of good feelings, that we now enjoy a calm; but it might be found a delusive one, and such as usually precedes a tornado in the South; at all events, we could not expect those halcyon days would forever last: he therefore took it for granted that the people would be divided into two great political parties; one he would call (for the sake of distinction, and not to revive party feelings which had so happily subsided) the aristocratic, and the other the democratic party. The struggle between these two great parties will be unceasingly and vigorously maintained, particularly in the popular branch of the legislature, and of course throughout the nation. The Executive will consequently belong to the party that may happen to prevail at the time of his election; but not so with the judges. It is not uncharitable to conclude that they, from the independent tenure of their offices, the distance you remove them from the control of the people, would naturally incline to the aristocratic party. Taking this to be the fact, Mr. L. said he would illustrate the subject by supposing, hypothetically, that the party now out of power should regain their ascendancy and elect a President suitable to their wishes; that this President, with a willing or subservient Congress at his back, should determine to perpetuate his power and the duration of a system of misrule and tyranny, by the passage of another sedition law, muzzling the press and sealing the lips of inquiry by the threatening horrors of a dungeon. But, I shall be gravely told, said he, there can be no danger; that an independent judiciary would declare the law unconstitutional, and rescue the citizen from Executive oppression. And to whom do gentlemen look for this relief? What mighty arm is to interpose between the humble citizen and an enraged Executive, struggling with the convulsive grasp of death to retain abused power? Why, said Mr. L., the bill before us answers the question; it declares the Supreme Court shall consist of five judges, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum; and of course two judges, being a majority of a quorum, are made competent to decide this or any other question. And how, said Mr. L., can gentlemen flatter themselves that a decision made by two or three judges, on a question of this magnitude, would give general satisfaction? The question he had stated was one of vital interest to the nation. It would be a decision of political life or death to an ambitious President and his associates. Could it be believed that Executive influence would not be brought to bear on the subject? Would the dazzling splendors of the palace and the drawing-room have no charms for judges in the immediate neighborhood? Would the flattery and soothing attentions of a designing Executive, aided by a powerful cabinet, be lost and entirely unavailing? I fear, said Mr. L., they would not. It would be almost in vain to hope for a favorable result to the cause of justice and freedom under such adverse circumstances.

Mr. L. said, further to illustrate the subject, he would mention a recent occurrence, to show how likely it was that judicial officers would concur with our Executive in political opinions. As early as 1795 an act was passed, (agreeably to Constitutional provisions) authorizing the President to call upon the Governors, or any militia officers of the respective States, for such portions of the militia as he deemed necessary to repel even a threatened invasion of the country. Under this law, in the late war, the President of the United States called upon the Governor of Massachusetts for his quota of militia. The Governor refused to comply with the requisition, alleging that it belonged to the State authorities—that it was left to their directions to say whether the necessity existed or not, that was to justify the calling forth the militia. The Governor, however, determined to lay the subject before the judges of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. A majority of them were convened, and they unanimously and solemnly decided that the Governor was right in disregarding the orders of the President, issued in strict conformity to the Constitution and laws of the United States. He would not charge, Mr. L. said, the Governor nor the judges, in this case, with wilful corruption. Motives so base ought not to be imputed to the officers of a sister State; but, he must believe they acted under the influence of the strongest political delusion. With their motives, however, he had nothing to do. It was sufficient for him to state the fact, for the purpose of showing with what facility the judges may be brought to act in accordance with the political views of the Executive.

Mr. L. said he felt a strong repugnance to that part of the bill that invited the judges to make Washington the seat of their settled residence. This Government was emphatically called that of the people. Its existence depended on the all-powerful influence of public opinion. The affection of the people for the Government and its functionaries, is the cement, the adhesive quality that binds the nation together. Dissolve this, and all is lost. How necessary then, said Mr. L., is it that you should secure that affection. To do this, as relates to the judicial branch, it is necessary that they should be domiciliated in the different sections of our country; that they should perform circuit duties; that, as citizens of the State in which they live, they should feel a sacred regard for State rights, and that, as men, they should mingle with the great family of the American people, securing their esteem by social and friendly intercourse. By this means, said he, your judges, when they come together, would not only be better qualified to discharge their important functions, but would bring with them the confidence and esteem of the nation.

Mr. L. said that, it appeared to him, the committee who reported the bill had not considered, with their usual sagacity, its provisions, nor the vast and almost unlimited province of the court to be established. They had wrought on a small scale, as if providing for the administration of justice in a town corporate, or a single county. They surely had not considered that this court of two, three, or at most, five judges, held in their hands the political destinies of this mighty nation; and yet, said Mr. L. a single decision, if acquiesced in, and such a decision as was made by the Massachusetts court, would unbinge the whole system, and its demolition would follow, as if by the magic wand of enchantment. This court, said Mr. L., beside the powers specifically granted by the Constitution, is said to possess the power to declare such laws void as they may consider unconstitutional. This extends as well to the State laws coming within their cognizance, as to the acts of Congress. Against the right to exercise this tremendous power, I have, said he, feebly protested, when it has been asserted on this floor; but the right has been exercised by the court, silently acquiesced in by the nation, and often conceded in this Senate. This goes far, said Mr. L., to establish its legitimacy, and he would, for the sake of argument, so consider it. In this point of view, then, said he, the subject becomes still more imposing. This is not a court clothed with ordinary powers for the purpose of distributing justice between man and man, and the punishment of offenders against the laws, nor is its jurisdiction confined to controversies between the individual State sovereignties; but this august tribunal is the grand revising council of the nation, with the power of an absolute veto on the laws passed by Congress. In short, said he, this court is to decide the extent of legislative authority under the Constitution. And did gentlemen wish the judges to be on the spot, that they might be conveniently consulted as to what bills should be passed and what rejected? If so, he confessed the bill on the table would answer their purpose. But for his part, Mr. L. said, considering the extensive and important powers lodged in this court, he could wish to see the number of judges increased instead of diminished. He never would consent that the right of Congress to call forth the militia for national defence, the liberty of speech and of the press, with other questions of vital interest to the nation, should be submitted to the judgment of any two men, and they, perhaps, rendered imbecile, impotent, and almost torpid with age and infirmity.

Mr. L. said, as there were many gentlemen in the Senate much further advanced in life than himself, he would not undertake to advise or admonish them; but his duty compelled him to beseech and conjure them to reflect, and pause before they passed the Rubicon of error. If, he said, this measure, be adopted, he should be almost willing to agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Otis,) that we were treading in the footsteps of a former Administration, that had been put down by an offended nation, and, like them, said he, we should deserve and receive the same reward.

When Mr. L. had concluded, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until tomorrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Corporation of the City of Washington to open and extend certain streets," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Abalom Litt, praying the passage of an act to enable him to enter a section of land, in lieu of one erroneously made, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EATON presented the petition of William Langston, praying a pension, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Richard Bland Lee, made a report, accompanied by a resolution that the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted. The report and resolution were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, for information in relation to the measures that have been taken to collect the balances stated to be due from the several supervisors and collectors of the old direct tax of two millions, and of the balances due from the officers of the old internal revenue; and agreed thereto.

The bill for the relief of John Clark was read the second time.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Hall Jervy," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Moss," was read the second time, and referred to the same committee, to consider and report thereon.

The bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1819," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution for the distribution of Seybert's Statistical Annals; and directing Pitkin's Commercial Statistics to be deposited in the Library; and the same having been amended, it was reported to the House accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, it was ordered to be engrossed, and the resolution be read a third time as amended.

The bill further to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payment thereon, was read a third time, and passed.

The amendment to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Doctor Matrom Ball," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate took up for consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, the amendment to the Constitution, which provides for a uniform mode of choosing (by districts) Electors of President and Vice President, and of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, spoke nearly as follows:

Mr. President, at the last session of Congress I had the honor to introduce a resolution similar to the one under consideration. This I did, in obedience to instructions received from the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, which State I have the honor, in part, to represent. After a discussion of the merits of the resolution, a large majority of the Senate were found to be in favor of it, but not a majority of two thirds, and of course it was lost.

For several years past, the principle of this resolution (first adopted, I believe, in the Legislature of North Carolina) has been gaining ground, and particularly within the last year, as we may fairly conclude, from the instructions which have been recently laid upon our table, from the States of New Hampshire, Connecticut, and New York.

If there were no reasonable hopes of bringing this measure to a favorable issue, I might be fairly considered as rendering myself unnecessarily troublesome, by agitating it at this time; but while there is a hope of success, and I think present circumstances warrant such a hope, I cannot consider myself absolved from the obligations imposed upon me by my instructions. Under this impression, and acting as well from a sense of the great importance of the subject as a sense of the duty which I owe to my constituents, I again earnestly, but respectfully, solicit the attention of the Senate to this resolution; which I should have introduced in the first week of the present session, but from a hope that some other member of this honorable body would have taken upon himself that task. As no one seemed so disposed, it appeared to me improper longer to procrastinate a measure which ought to receive a discussion before our attention is engrossed by the usual objects of legislation.

As the Senate have once indulged me with a hearing upon this resolution, it is my intention to be as brief in the observations which I am now about to make, as the nature and importance of the subject will permit, more especially on those points of argument which I had the honor to submit; for, as the subject is old and hacknied, I am sensible, and I feel oppressed by the reflection, that any observations I can now make will be considered as tedious and irksome by most of those who hear me.

The Constitution of the United States wisely provides for its own amendment, but, in doing this, it interposes such obstacles to the spirit of innovation, as not only effectually to prevent all unnecessary alteration, but, as I fear, to prevent the most salutary reform.

An amendment cannot be proposed to the States, unless two-thirds of each branch of the National Legislature concur in the measure; and when proposed, three-fourths of the States must concur before it can become a part of the Constitution; great, therefore, are the difficulties, arduous the task, and doubtful the issue, of any attempt to alter the Constitution. There is, besides, a sort of sanctity attached to this instrument, that leads many to consider it as something superhuman, something partaking of divine origin—such consider any attempt to alter it as a sort of political profanation; a sacrilege against the palladium of our liberties. In addition to this, there is a general disinclination to disturb established regulations, a species of vis inertia, which can only be overcome by the most pressing urgency. These are difficulties attending all attempts to alter the Constitution.

The amendment under consideration is attended with difficulties peculiar to itself. It proposes to the dominant parties in the respective States, without whose aid it cannot succeed, to give up a portion of their power. Such applications are always unwelcome, and but rarely attended with success, whether made to individuals, to States, or to political parties.

The dominant party in New York, for instance, by no means an overwhelming majority, can, under the present system, give twenty-nine votes, that is, the whole vote of the State, on a Presidential election; under the proposed system of choosing Electors, their vote would be proportioned to their numbers. The same observation will apply, in a greater or less degree to the dominant parties in all the States of the Union.

It requires no small degree of patriotism, on the part of majorities, to divest themselves of the power of restraining the minorities, whom they always consider as their political adversaries. I trust, however, that notwithstanding these multiplied difficulties, the paramount consideration of the general good will prevail, and that this measure will be attended with ultimate success. Such a result, however, would be utterly hopeless in times of political rancor and party violence, when majorities always think that the public good is most effectually promoted by restraining, as far as possible, the power of the minorities, who, in such unhappy times, are always considered, and always stigmatized, as the enemies of their country.

Happily for us, the present moment is peculiarly auspicious for undertaking the proposed amendment, as there is less of party animosity now than there has been at any period since the establishment of our Government. If the present opportunity be suffered to pass by unimproved, it may never again occur; for we discover very little sagacity, if we presume that the present political calm is to be permanent, or even of any considerable duration.

This plan, of dividing the States into districts, is no new experiment; it is no innovation, whatever, upon the Constitution; it is only calculated to render permanent and uniform a regulation which has prevailed in nearly all the States, and which ought to have prevailed in all, and would have prevailed in all, by common consent, but for the disorganizing spirit of party. Whatever mode may be adopted for choosing Electors and Representatives, it is universally allowed that it ought to be uniform throughout the United States.

Under the old Confederation the Congress was considered as a representation of the States, and they voted by States. The House of Representatives is now, or ought to be, a representation of the people, and they are emphatically called the popular branch, to distinguish them from the Senate, which may still be considered as a representation of the States; and the popular branch is considered as the main stay and strong hold of the republican principles of our Government.

If the Legislature of a State should appoint their Representatives to Congress, as they do their Senators, (even if the Constitution were as vague and uncertain, in this particular, as it is with respect to the appointment of Electors,) we should consider the proceeding in the highest degree preposterous, inasmuch as it would leave to such Representatives no character of a popular branch. Yet the choosing the Representatives of a State by what is called a general ticket, in which the voice of the minority is completely merged, is equally preposterous, and generally much more so, as the people vote for candidates of whose qualifications and characters they are ignorant, upon the recommendation of individuals, of whom, frequently, they know nothing, who assemble in convention or caucus, settle the fate of the election before the people are called upon for their votes, and thus pervert every principle of what we are pleased to call the universal right of suffrage.

The resolution proposes that each State shall be divided into as many districts as it has Representatives; the districts to consist of contiguous territory, and to contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled to be represented. It would be impossible to go further in this particular, without introducing too much regulation, without rendering the system unnecessarily complicated. The rule is perfectly fair, perfectly republican, attended with no difficulties, and, if adopted, will secure to all parties that degree of influence and power, proportioned to their numbers, which, in a Republic, they may fairly claim by every principle of honor and justice.

As these districts are to be altered but once in ten years, the tendency to fluctuation and change will be sufficiently counteracted. It may be thought that, as the new States are rapidly increasing, the districts should be altered more frequently, to correspond with the rapid increase of population. We must recollect, however, that altering the districts could not increase the number of Representatives or Electors to which a State might be entitled; and in any other point of view, it can be of but little importance.

Under the present system of choosing Representatives, it is the practice, as much as possible, to suppress the voice of the minorities, and this provoking tyranny is practised under the specious garb of Republicanism. In the small States, the elections take place most commonly, by what is called a general ticket. This completely suppresses the voice of the minority, and may be a representation of the dominant party, but not of the people of a State.

In the large States, the difficulties of voting by general ticket are so great, that they are induced, from necessity, to adopt some system of forming districts; but the dominant parties, unwilling to give to the minorities the weight to which they are entitled by their numbers, or anything like it, have adopted an irregular mode of districting, known by the opprobrious term of gerrymandering; by which they cut up and parcel out a State into unequal and inconvenient districts, formed, too frequently, with a total disregard of the principles of justice, the rights of the citizen, or the appearance of decency.

In what estimation can we hold the majority of a Legislature, coolly and deliberately, dividing and carving up a State into irregular districts, some large, and some small—some to choose one Representative, some two, some three, and some four, in such a manner as to suppress, as far as possible, the influence of their political opponents, taking care to have in each district, a sufficient majority of their own party to make all safe, but no more. In forming such districts, the utmost skill and address have been observed, creditable indeed to the ingenuity, but disgraceful to the motives and the principles of the actors. I could relate many instances of outrage and abuse under this head, as I did on a former occasion; but I am unwilling to exhibit the disgusting picture. Such gross perversion of the principles of our Government, has a direct tendency to destroy all respect for our political institutions, to bring our Constitution into contempt, and to introduce into our legislative bodies no small degree of moral, as well as political, turpitude.

It may, and probably will, be said, that it is not necessary to amend the Constitution on this point, as Congress have the power to regulate the election of Representatives. There is no probability that Congress will ever exercise this power, except in cases where States wholly refuse or neglect to provide for the election of its Representatives. It is by no means clear that Congress have the power to pass a law, making it obligatory on the Legislature of a State, to divide that State into districts: and if Congress should undertake to divide the States into districts, they would find themselves involved in infinite difficulties—besides, should a State be divided without the consent of its Legislature, in a manner unaccountable to a majority of the people, it would create the greatest discontent, and be considered as a sort of State degradation.

The Convention thought proper to give this power to Congress, under an apprehension that a combination of States might embarrass the measures of Government by refusing to send Representatives to Congress. In this point of view, the provision was a wise one; but the danger against which it was meant to provide, has long since passed by, and the new States which we have added to the Union have a tendency to prevent such combinations.

Important as the proposed amendment is, as it respects the choice of Representatives in Congress, it is vastly more important as it respects the choice of Electors. In the first case, the just rights of a large portion of our citizens are constantly infringed; in the latter, those rights are not only equally infringed, but the permanency and existence of our Government is put to hazard.

To choose a chief magistrate for ten millions of people, jealous of their rights, and impatient of control, even in the best regulated system, must be attended with no small degree of danger: this danger increases with the increasing extent of our territory, and the increase of our population. What have we not to apprehend when our population shall amount to fifty millions, as it will do in a period less than that which has elapsed since the Declaration of Independence!

We are in the habit of looking with great composure upon the return of our Presidential elections; but, little as we apprehend from this subject, it is probably the rock upon which our liberties are to be wrecked. We all remember when the power of our country, perhaps the existence of our Government, hung in doubtful suspense upon the frail breath of two or three individuals, and that from a fault in that part of the Constitution which the framers of it thought the most perfect—pleasing indeed in theory, but utterly fallacious in practice.

This amendment proposes, that each district shall choose one Elector; the two additional Electors, to which a State may be entitled, to be appointed as the Legislature thereof shall direct. This avoids the inconvenience of double districts, which would be complicated and troublesome, and it adopts the spirit of that part of our Constitution which apportions the Electors of a State, not in a ratio of its Representatives or its Senators, but in a compound ratio of both. The two additional Electors may be considered as analogous to the Senators, and the others as analogous to the Representatives. This is not a consideration of great importance, but it is a recommendation of the measure, inasmuch as it more distinctly marks this peculiar feature of our Constitution.

This will give as fair an impression of the public will as can possibly be obtained, unless, indeed, we resort to a general vote of the people at large, without regard to the limits of States or Districts. And it appoints to us a point of immense magnitude; one upon which depends the vital principle of our Constitution, and even the existence of our Government. It secures to us, that the President of the United States shall be elected by a majority, and never by a minority of the people.

Upon a calculation of chances, the probabilities of a fair expression of the public will are increased by dividing the States into districts, and in the ratio of the number of districts to the number of States. It is true, the minority in the respective districts would be suppressed; but as the minority of one which might be suppressed in one district, would probably be balanced by the suppression of the minority of the other party in another district, the general result would be a fair expression of the public will. If, in the State of Massachusetts, we suppose the political parties which now exist, or hereafter may exist, to be about equally divided, an election by a general ticket would, of necessity, entirely suppress the voice of the minority—but if the State were divided into twenty districts, as it would be by the proposed amendment, such a result would not happen once in a thousand elections. It would be an equal chance that the Representatives so chosen would be as their constituents, about equally divided. If the parties were as one to two, it would be an equal chance that the representation would be in the same ratio; but these points are too clear to need elucidation.

Besides, the distinct system will place insuperable barriers to the intrigues of ambitious individuals, who will hereafter agitate the Union at the approach of every Presidential election.

In the process of electing a President there ought to be more uniformity, more precision, and more certainty, than in the election of any other officer whatever; and yet, strange as it may appear, there is less. It is a reproach to us, that there is scarcely the shadow of uniformity, precision, or certainty, in any of the rules by which we elect, beyond comparison, the most important officer in our Government.

By the Constitution each State shall appoint, as the Legislature thereof shall direct, its number of Electors. By the letter of this provision, the Legislature of a State may direct that the Electors shall be chosen by the people, in a general ticket; or they may direct that they shall be chosen in equal districts, or they may resort to the iniquitous system of irregular districts; but, I cannot admit that, by a strict construction of the Constitution, the Legislature shall direct how they themselves shall appoint the Electors. Yet, this power has been assumed by the Legislatures of most of the States. If this be an infringement of the Constitution, the procedure ought to be corrected. If there be a doubt upon the subject, which I think will not be denied, a remedy should be supplied; for, in this vital part of our Constitution, there should be no doubtful points.

When the Legislatures have taken this power into their own hands, they have made the appointments sometimes by a joint vote of the two Houses, sometimes by concurrent vote, sometimes by compromise; sometimes the resolutions, under which the appointments have been made, have received the approbation of the Executive, when such approbation was necessary, and sometimes not. The Executives have sometimes been authorized to fill up the vacancies in the list of Electors; sometimes the Electors themselves to fill the vacancies, and sometimes the case has been unprovided for; when the people have exercised this power, it has sometimes been by general ticket, sometimes by equal districts, and sometimes by a detestable system of gerrymandering. This great variety of modes, has put into operation the most extensive intrigues, which have disgraced our Constitution, and on one occasion, that of 1801, put to hazard the peace of our country.

Many of the States have adopted the worst possible system of choosing Electors; that is, by their Legislatures. Other States, although they condemn this mode, will be induced to adopt it as a measure of self-defence, and will be justified in doing so—and it will soon be adopted in all, or nearly all the States. And, when so generally adopted, will afford to some aspiring individual the means of arriving at the Presidential chair, against the will of a large majority of the people, and of perpetuating his power by destroying the liberties of his country.

It is evident that if the Legislatures of the States appoint the Electors, the voice of the minorities in the respective States must be entirely suppressed—than which nothing can be more unjust, or more dangerous; as it would, independently of other circumstances which I have mentioned, increase the rancor and bitterness of party in the States, and exhibit the States in a sort of hostile array against each other.

When this subject was under discussion, last session, I had the honor of submitting a calculation, showing the manner in which a President might be elected against the will of a large majority of the people, and a large majority of States, which I will beg leave to repeat. The whole number of Electors for the nineteen States composing the Union at the last Presidential election is 221, of which 111 make a majority, and can choose a President. The States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina, which are composed of contiguous territory, and may have strong political reasons for combination, have 113 Electors,—two more than are necessary for choosing President. A bare majority in the Legislatures of these six States—one of them a small State, and one of middle size—could, by possibility, counteract the will of six or seven millions of people, and elect a President in defiance of the residue of the Union. The Legislatures of five States—Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia—which have 112 Electors, could produce the same effect. But, if we take into calculation the twenty-one States now forming the Union, they have 227 Electors; add Alabama, which is soon to be a State, the number would be 220—a majority of 116. The six first-mentioned States, with the State of Delaware, have 117 Electors, and can choose a President.

The cases I have stated are extreme cases. It is said extreme cases prove nothing. So it would be with these, if the evil to be apprehended must happen in the extreme degree stated, or not happen at all. But it is very obvious that there are many intermediate degrees of mischief, which may and will happen at every contested Presidential election, if we adhere to our present system.

How easily will it be to procure combinations among State Legislatures, and how admirably calculated to promote the schemes of ambition! The small band of intriguers necessary for such operations would have the strongest possible inducements for perseverance, as they would divide or calculate to divide among themselves the whole patronage of the President, and all the places and emoluments within his gift. In this, however, they would sometimes find themselves disappointed, when the individual they had elevated should find himself in a situation to kick from under him the ladder by which he had ascended.

In proportion as we diminish the circle upon which intrigue is to act, in the same proportion do we add to the force and energy of that intrigue. Suppose it to be ascertained that the majority in five of the six States first mentioned are in favor of a particular candidate as President, and that the point is doubtful as respects the sixth, and that the gaining an influential individual would turn the balance: the force of intrigue, which would produce no sensible effect upon two hundred and twenty-one districts, would be irresistible when applied to a single point.

And here let me observe, that our present system holds out the most inviting theatre for the exercise of foreign intrigue and foreign influence, against which we are warned to guard and protect ourselves by the histories of all nations who have lost their liberties. We must all have observed, that the greatest struggles for power between the political parties have immediately preceded the Presidential elections. These struggles in the States nearly equally divided—especially in the large States—will continue to be pursued to desperation under the present system; for the object, vastly greater than it should be, is calculated to call forth every possible exertion. Everything is put to hazard. A party must gain or lose all: there is no intermediate point on which to rest. In the State of New York, for instance, if the Federal party should gain such an accession of strength as to give them a bare majority in the Legislature, they would, instead of having no vote whatever in the election of a President, be enabled to give their candidate twenty-nine votes; and this number, taken from the opposing candidate, would in fact make a difference of fifty-eight votes in the election. The object therefore being so very great, no bound would be set to the parties in their struggle for power; and in the furious contest, honor, justices conscience, all, would go to wreck.

Whenever the majority in a great State changes from the one side to the other, it produces such a concussion as not only to shake the State to the centre, but to produce an agitation in the Union, destructive of the harmony that ought to prevail in our system.

This very circumstance, in no small degree, tends to create and keep alive that party animosity, that political warfare, which almost constantly agitates and distracts the larger States. How different would the case be under the proposed amendment! Suppose the Federalists in New York to be nearly equal to their opponents, and to have majorities in thirteen of the twenty-seven districts into which that State would be divided, a struggle, which under the present system would give them a bare majority in the Legislature, and make a difference of fifty-eight votes in the Presidential election, would be in fact but gaining one district and the power of appointing the two additional Electors—being a gain of three Electors, and making a difference of six in the election. The object, therefore, not being comparatively of great importance, would produce no desperate struggle—no dangerous agitation. There would still, however, be enough left to call forth all the party feeling that ought ever to be excited.

Under the present system, it is greatly to be apprehended that some aspiring individual may gain the supreme power, against the will of a great majority of the people. To submit to such a President would be deemed an intolerable oppression, and would probably end in the loss of our liberties. To resist the most probable alternative would bring on a civil war, which would terminate in a military despotism; and the danger of this result is evidently increased by increasing the number of States.

It is not probable that the Constitution when submitted to the States for ratification was such as exactly pleased any one of the Convention who formed it, or those who concurred in its ratification. It was perhaps the best that could have been agreed upon, amidst the conflicting interests and contrariety of sentiments, that prevailed among the members of the Convention. The wonder is, not that it has faults, but that it has so few faults, considering the circumstances under which it was formed. The instrument carries on its face an admission, that it is imperfect, by providing the means of its amendment, without which provision it would never have been ratified by the required number of States. Indeed many who concurred in the ratification, did it under express declarations, that important amendments were necessary, some of which were stated at the time, and have since become a part of the Constitution. But human wisdom could not foresee all the amendments, that experience might prove to be necessary. And in the second contested Presidential election, that of 1801, our Government was upon the point of dissolution, in consequence of the provision requiring the Electors to vote for two persons as President, against which no voice has been raised.

The most difficult task that devolved upon the Convention who formed our Constitution, was to establish the principles which should regulate the election and control the power of the Chief Executive. This subject no doubt received their most diligent attention, their most laborious investigation. And yet I hope I shall not be accused of any want of respect for the statesmen and patriots who formed that Constitution, if I express an opinion, that the provisions on this subject do not exhibit that degree of wisdom, which, judging from other parts of the same instrument, we had a right to expect from them.

The regulations for choosing the Executive of the United States are more vague, more uncertain, more undefined, more variable, more subject to abuse, than are the regulations for choosing the meanest officer in the community. And as to any effectual control upon the power of the Executive, that must depend, as it heretofore has done, rather upon the virtues of the individual exercising the office, than upon any positive regulations contained in the Constitution. The broad road to monarchy is left open—encumbered indeed with obstructions, but such as will easily yield to the pressure of ambition.

The most obvious barrier to the career of ambition on the part of a President, would have been a reasonable limit to the time in which any one could exercise this important office. This, however, was omitted, no doubt after a full discussion of the subject, and for reasons which I cannot divine. As yet, it is true, experience has not exhibited any necessity for such a barrier, for the ambition of our Presidents, thus far, has been, not to extend or perpetuate their power, but to increase the happiness and prosperity of the country over which they have presided. This, however, let us remember, is not the usual current of ambition.

SENATE.

Amendment to the Constitution.

JANUARY, 1819.

We have constantly the most deplorable evidence of the total inadequacy of our system to regulate, with any degree of safety, the election of a President. In the year 1801, it was in the power of a single individual, in the Senate of Pennsylvania, to give to that State fifteen Electors or to deprive her entirely of a vote, at his pleasure. In the election of a President that year, all the Electors of South Carolina were in favor of the candidate who ultimately succeeded, but the State, in the House of Representatives, voted against him; at the same time all the Electors of New Jersey voted against that candidate, and the State in the House of Representatives voted in his favor, in six and thirty ballots. In 1812, a very large majority of the State of New Jersey and all their Representatives in Congress were in favor of the candidate then elected, but the votes of all her Electors were against him; and this by an abuse of power, that may probably be practised again, in that as well as other States.

We cannot look into the history of our Presidential elections, without meeting at every step, the most deplorable proofs of the imbecility of our system.

Warned by the dangers we escaped in 1801, we have so far altered the Constitution that we shall not again be exposed in precisely the same manner, and by precisely the same cause we were before. But there are other dangers much more apparent than that was, before actual experiment had presented it to our view;—dangers which can never be obviated while the minority have the power of choosing a President.

Great as the danger is, that some ambitious individual may gain the Presidential Chair against the will of a large majority of the people, the subject presents itself in another point of view, not less interesting. I mean the operation of our system, to enable an ambitious President to perpetuate his power and to transmit it to his posterity. It is true, the illustrious patriots who have filled that exalted station have none of them discovered a wish to continue in office, for a longer period than eight years;—but such instances of voluntary retirement from power are rare occurrences in the annals of the world, and will some ages hence be cited as almost incredible instances of the virtue of the ancient Republic. Such examples, however, will in future times be rather the object of praise than of imitation.

Let us suppose, that at some future period, we shall have a President of forty years of age, of great talents, unbounded ambition, and an insatiable thirst for power; the period of eight years would elapse at about that period of life when ambition takes the firmest hold of the human mind. He would easily persuade himself that the public interests would suffer by his retiring from office. The great facility of securing a re-election under our present system, would be a temptation not to be resisted. And the host of choice spirits, by whom he would be surrounded, would certainly succeed in persuading him to bear the weight of Government, for another period, and another, and another, to the end of his life.

Suppose this President to have a son of talents and ambition like his own, and of a suitable age to become his successor. The transmission of the power from the father to the son would excite no unusual apprehension. His election would be a mere matter of form, and our Government would quietly sink into an hereditary monarchy; after which a Tiberius, Caligula, or a Claudius, might reign uncontrolled in America. These are not mere illusions—mere phantoms of the brain. Had the candidate in 1801, for whom such desperate but unsuccessful efforts were made, succeeded in obtaining, in the House of Representatives, a place for which he was not intended by a single Elector who voted, he would eagerly have seized upon the reins of Government. And what would have been the consequence? We have reason to believe he would have been hurled from his chair, by an insulted and an indignant people. Terrible indeed would have been this resort, which would have produced the utmost anarchy and confusion and all the horrors of a civil war.

But suppose he had possessed those great military talents which his friends have gratuitously ascribed to him, and had been enabled, with the Treasury and the small military force that would have been at his disposal, to crush all opposition to his power, would he not under our present system, with his talents for intrigue, which have never been overrated, by his friends or his enemies, and which have been rarely equalled in any country?—would he not have been able to secure a re-election, and another, and another, to the end of his life?

But suppose an incredible case, that, at the expiration of eight years, his ambition had ceased to operate, and that he no longer wished to continue in power: Would he have dared to retire to private life? Would he have dared to relinquish a power which for eight years he had held by force and fraud, in despite of the will of a great majority of the people? If he had despised danger as it respected himself, would he have abandoned his friends who had faithfully adhered to his fortunes, and supported his authority at all hazards? Sir, the moment he should have retired from power, a reaction would have taken place which would have overwhelmed him and his friends in ruin. Unfortunate indeed would be the situation of such a President; not so the situation of one elected by a majority of the people. He would rest securely upon the strong arm which had placed him in power, and which could protect him there. He would fear no popular commotions, no insurrections against the exercise of his lawful authority; and when he should have performed his official functions for a reasonable period, he might relieve himself from the weight and the cares of Government, and retire to private life, amidst the blessings of his fellow-citizens, where, exercising the virtues which have adorned the illustrious characters who have presided over the United States, he would find in his declining years that literary, philosophic, and sweet repose, so ardently desired by the great and the good in all ages of the world.

Amendment to the Constitution.

SENATE.

Let us not, while contemplating such examples of exalted virtue, which are the pride and the boast of our nation, be lulled into fatal security. Let us not forget that the constant tendency of our Government is towards despotism. Let us not forget that ambition is the strongest passion of the soul: "By that sin fell the angels." Let us not forget that it is a duty we owe to ourselves and to posterity to adopt every measure which may have a tendency to preserve the republican principles of our Government.

Have I overrated the dangers to be apprehended from ambition? I believe not. Those dangers are not immediately at our doors, but their existence is not the less certain on that account.

Sir, the time will come, I fear, when our country will be filled with an army of pensioners, always the friends of arbitrary power. The time will come when we shall have a numerous host of officers, civil and military, in every department of the Government, spread over our immense territory, looking up to the President as the source of their power and emoluments. The time will come when luxury and extravagance will banish from our country every species of republican virtue; and the time will come, I fear, when this Senate shall be no more than the shadow of what it was intended to be by those who formed our Constitution; when it shall be no check whatever upon the Executive; when it shall be as insignificant as was the boasted Senate of Rome, in the time of Tiberius. The whole patronage of Government will centre in the President, and that patronage, under our present system of choosing Electors, will become a machine of irresistible power. The management of this power will become a matter of science. He will be deemed the greatest politician and the most able minister, who can, with a given portion of patronage, produce the greatest effect. The force of this power will be applied to effect the purposes of ambition, with as much economy and skill as the force of water is applied to the wheel, or that of steam to the engine. It would be difficult to devise a plan better calculated to accelerate the approach of those deplorable events, or to promote the views of an ambitious President, than the present system of choosing Electors.

When, by a combination of a few States, by the obvious means which I have suggested, an ambitious President could control a majority of the people, he might throw off every show of ambition; might exercise from period to period the supreme power, with seeming reluctance, yielding to what would be called the voice of the country, and paving the way to monarchy, while the world would be amused with his hypocritical pretensions of a desire to retire from the weight of public affairs.

When Augustus Cæsar had secured to himself the support of the Senate and the army of Rome, he played the hypocritical farce of attempting to abdicate his usurped power; but was persuaded by those, who he knew would persuade him, to be considered as the head or Prince of the Senate, and, in conjunction with them, to administer the affairs of the Government for ten years, by which time peace and prosperity might be restored to the Commonwealth. At the expiration of that period the same ridiculous farce was repeated, and again and again, during his long life; and after he was as firmly seated on the imperial throne of Rome, as Alexander is upon that of all the Russias.

When Augustus seized upon the liberties of Rome, Brutus was dead; but his spirit was not extinct. Augustus found the Roman people, though greatly corrupted by the civil wars of his time, and those which immediately preceded it, still possessed of some spirit of independence, some love of liberty, but he left them all slaves.

The history of this extraordinary man affords the most impressive, the most admonitory lessons to the citizens of the United States. While his insidious march to empire will afford a model for the imitation of some future President, it should warn every citizen, who has the least love for his country, to watch with the utmost vigilance, and to provide every possible check against the ambition of such Presidents as may attempt to establish their power by the subversion of our liberties.

Some gentlemen may think that I have overrated the dangers to be apprehended from our present mode of choosing Electors; it may be so; I may have given more importance to the circumstances connected with this subject than they merit; but, if gentlemen, thinking so, deem my observations worthy of an answer, let them not satisfy themselves by showing that I have thus overrated those dangers; let them show that no such dangers exist; let them show that the Constitution already provides sufficient checks against the career of ambition, and I will vote with them.

The friends of this measure do not flatter themselves that the proposed amendment will afford a remedy for all the evils complained of; but it will afford a remedy for part of them. It will not eradicate the principles of ambition, but it will retard their progress. It will not render perpetual our republican form of Government, but it will probably add ages to its duration, and this is gaining an object of immense magnitude. It is gaining all that we are permitted to hope for.

The seeds of death are interwoven in our Constitution. Its fate is inevitable. No human wisdom can save it from dissolution; but by wise measures its existence may be continued for many ages. Ardent must be the wish of every patriot to put off the moment of its dissolution, and to the latest possible period.

We all know that the term of our life is limited; that death awaits us. None but madmen seek to evade this law of our nature; yet it is the dictate of wisdom to devise the means of prolonging life, and for putting off the moment of dissolution, to the latest period which the laws of our nature will permit.

It is my fervent prayer that the proposed amendment may be adopted, not with the vain hope of rendering our Government immortal, but for the purpose of securing the prosperity and integrity of the Union for many ages yet to come, and for the purpose of extending the blessings which we enjoy, to millions and millions of human beings who may inhabit our immense territories in a long succession of ages.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said: If the honorable gentleman from New Jersey rises with reluctance to address the Senate on the proposition under consideration, how much more should I, who, in addition to the reason assigned by the gentleman, labor under the consciousness of having to address an unwilling audience; who, instead of instructions in my pocket, justifying me in the course I should pursue, have no guide but a very fallible judgment; and who, instead of coming into the debate with my arguments and facts, digested with the aid of the most mature reflection, have to encounter those of my adversary in a desultory manner, with only a moment's warning. No ray of consolation meets my eye in this cloud of difficulties with which I am surrounded, but the conviction that I have a just cause, and the consolation that if I must fail I will not have done it without a struggle. The course I propose to pursue, is to submit a proposition for an indefinite postponement of the question, because I am indisposed to tampering with the Constitution; but if in this I should fail, I shall then propose an amendment which, as the one proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey, will break down the distinction between the States, and make the election national in its manner; it shall become essentially national in all its parts. I have a repugnance almost invincible to tampering with the Constitution—not from an idolatrous reverence, not from a belief that the instrument is perfect, as is intimated. Alas! I know too well that it is the work of finite, imperfect beings, and bears upon its face the impress of its authors; but because, under it, the people of the United States enjoy the greatest share of happiness which has been dispensed to human kind through countless ages. Nor are we alone interested in its blessings. What nation or what people, between the poles, where one ray of science has ever penetrated, who does not look to us as the last and best hope of suffering humanity? What suffering victim of lawless sway that does not cast his eye to this land of promise, looking to us across the waste of waters, with scarcely less hope than do we to that distant bourne where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest? To maintain this instrument, thus charged with the future destinies of the world, in its present form, till an evil of magnitude is disclosed, and till the remedy is presented, a remedy whose consequences are sure, is a species of loyalty and attachment which reason ratifies, and which every feeling of my heart cherishes. Yes, sir, the defect must be most apparent, and the remedy as palpable. The only disease is frequently rather in the doctor than the patient. This prodigious effort of political wisdom should always be contemplated as a whole. A part may strike the eye as defective, but, in connexion with the rest, may be indispensable as well to its harmony as its strength. I protest against adventures after theoretic perfection. In attempting this, you may involve us in disastrous consequences; and, however perfect a proposed remedy may appear in the abstract, yet, when it comes to be acted upon by the tempestuous and irregular passions of man, its results may be most pernicious.

If these be my sentiments upon alterations in the Constitution, which do not involve the fundamental articles of that instrument—articles the result of compromise between the States—they acquire additional strength when an amendment is proposed, which affects such parts of the Constitution as palpably resulted from such compromise, and upon which its validity mainly depends. To illustrate my views, permit me to state, were a doubt to arise as to the power granted, a particular branch of the Government, or, if you will, Congress—take for example the right of connecting the States by inland navigation, by which their commerce, whose regulation is confided to Congress—would be greatly benefited; if a doubt should exist as to the right of Congress to exercise such a power, and the nation were divided on this question, I should feel no difficulty in appealing to the people, the original source of our authority, for their interpretation of the extent of their own grant, and to abide by an expression of their will. On the contrary, were some Utopian to suggest that the representation of the small States in this body, when compared to the large, was too unequal to be endured, and propose as a remedy a recurrence to the basis of our institutions, the will of the majority, I should consider the proposition as involving an entire departure from the compact, and as essentially involving the most sacred engagement, one which had for its guarantee the plighted faith of the contracting parties. Considering, therefore, that one branch of the amendment proposed does seriously affect an article of the Constitution, thus secured, I am anxious to defeat it.

The resolution under consideration proposes two amendments:—The one to regulate the manner of choosing Representatives; the other of choosing Electors for President and Vice President. As to the first, it is unnecessary, because, by the 4th section of the Constitution, Congress have the power already to direct the time, place, and manner, of choosing Representatives. Why ask for an amendment of the Constitution; why not bring in a bill? Because, says the gentleman, he cannot indulge a hope of its success. A suggestion the more remarkable, as the gentleman had already expressed his fears of failure in his efforts to obtain an amendment to the Constitution, from the obstacles presented in the instrument itself, two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the States being requisite to give validity to the amendment. If he cannot procure a majority of Congress to a bill which should take the principle of his amendment as its basis, he has, indeed, good cause to apprehend that he will be unable to procure the Constitutional majorities here and in the State Legislatures. For my part, I am far from mingling my regrets with those of the honorable gentleman, in regard to the difficulty of obtaining amendments. On the contrary, I hail it as a new evidence of the wisdom of the authors of the Constitution—a majority of whom had arrived at that period of life from which they might look upon the past and read the lesson of experience. They must have seen that restlessness of spirit in man which was even fatigued with doing well, and which continually prompts us to pursue an imaginary good, to grasp at a shadow and lose the substance; an attribute implanted in our nature by Providence for some wise purpose, but which, unless regulated by wholesome checks, not unfrequently involves individuals and nations in remediless ruin.

But, sir, it is to me no small matter of surprise, that such a proposition as this should be submitted to this body; a body to whom, at the last session, an amendment of the Constitution was submitted, to explain a doubt as to the extent of our power; a question which had equally divided the nation, taking the sentiments of the Representatives as a just criterion. I mean, of course, the power of the National Government as to internal improvements; a question which, above all others, called for an amendment, and nine voices only, I believe, were in its favor. How then can the Senate, composed of the same members, give their assent to the present, when it is not pretended that our power is not full and explicit. The people will reply, as they ought. Why mock us in this way? You ask for power which you unequivocally have; and refuse to consult us upon that which is doubtful. It is no part of my duty to attempt to reconcile this palpable inconsistency. One word further. I will promise the gentleman, if he will bring in a bill in conformity to the 4th section, my cordial support, for I entirely approve the principle, that the Representatives should be elected by districts, as thereby a result will be produced most essential to the full effect of the true principles of our Government, that the Representative should be fully known to his constituents; and, by residing among them, should know their wants, and participate their feelings and interests; presenting in this a strong contrast to that of the Elector, who has but one insulated duty to perform, that of voting for the character his constituents prefer, as President, and of whom a pledge is always required, and indeed given, before he is supported by the people. So that, in effect, it is of little consequence who is selected, as he serves only as an organ, to convey the wishes of his constituents to the Electoral college. He furnishes the only requisite, by the pledge he previously gives of supporting the man of their choice.

But to proceed to the second amendment, which proposes to change the mode of electing Electors. It must be perceived that the first effect will be to deprive the States of the power, given them by the Constitution, of directing the mode of their election.

It is worthy of remark, that while the Constitution has given to Congress the power of regulating the time, place, and manner of choosing Representatives, and also of regulating the time and manner of choosing the Senators; yet Congress had no power to touch this subject save only that of directing the time of choosing the Electors, and that power retained only from necessity, for the purpose of producing a uniformity as to the time, to guard against corruption throughout the United States. If it were esteemed proper to give this right to the States, and to withhold it from Congress, upon the adoption of the Constitution, what delinquency have the States committed to produce a forfeiture of their rights? What reason presents itself to justify this curtailment of their privileges? It is urged, because in New Jersey and Pennsylvania they abused the power; and because two States of the Union, in times of great party heat, conducted themselves irregularly, disgracefully if you will, the sin is to be imputed to every State in the Union so as to result in their disfranchisement. Upon the same principle, if one or two of the districts were to conduct themselves in the same way, and complaint was lodged against them, the whole also should forfeit their rights, and some new mode must be substituted. It is vain to argue against a system because bad men, when in power, occasionally abuse it. It is sufficient, for human purposes, if it has been exposed to the most violent shocks, and, upon the whole, has survived unhurt, and produced all the good consequences anticipated. Such, I contend, is the mode as at present established by the Constitution. In no instance has one been elected to the high station of Chief Magistrate of the nation who had not, at the time, a majority of the people; and, without indulging vain hopes, we may confidently expect we shall never have to encounter a severer trial than that through which we have passed.

But my principal objection to the proposed amendment arises from the gross inequality of its effects against the large, and in favor of the small States. If, therefore, the Senate should resolve to cancel the compromise out of which, unquestionably, grew the arrangement of the Constitution in regard to the Presidential election, and gentlemen are sincere in their professions that they wish the election of the President to depend on the unbiassed and uncontrolled will of the majority, and to effect this they are prepared to strip the States of a portion of the power given them by the Constitution, then let them unite with me in an amendment which shall place the election upon their choice, without regard to the division of territory into States. That is, if the election must be national in its manner, let it also be in principle; to that end let the number of Electors be in proportion to the Representatives of each State, to the exclusion of Senators, and in the event of no election by a majority of the people, and the consequent devolution of the election on the House of Representatives, let the election there be decided by plurality of voices, and not by States. This mode presents a national election, not merely in form, but in substance. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not wish to disturb the present arrangement, and nothing would induce me to submit a proposition of the kind but as a defensive measure.

By the Constitution, as at present, the election is of a compound character. Partly national, in so far as the number of Electors shall be equal to the number of Representatives, and Federal in so far as the Electors shall, from each State, great or small, be equal to their representation in this body; and exclusively Federal, or by the States, in the event of devolution of the election on the House of Representatives where they vote, not numerically, but by States. Leaving the right of regulating the election to the States, the large States do not so sensibly feel these advantages, already enjoyed by the small States. Voting, as they do, unanimously, they have something like their due weight in the election; but cut up into districts, it may happen that Rhode Island may have four votes, and New York, in effect only one, by a division of votes. If regard were had only to numbers, the weight of Rhode Island to New York would be as thirteen and a half to one; but, in consequence of the two votes given to Rhode Island as an independent State, she is entitled to four votes, and New York, to twenty-nine, and consequently reducing the influence of New York, when compared to Rhode Island, to seven and a half instead of thirteen and a half, and thereby depriving her of nearly half her influence. Nor is this all, for, in the event of no election by the people, New York and Rhode Island have precisely an equal influence in the election of President. With all these advantages under the existing regulations, the small States are not yet satisfied, but propose an amendment by which this important advantage may be frequently brought into active operation—by the division of the vote for President. I am justifiable in saying that the election will more frequently devolve upon the House of Representatives by the adoption of the amendment, as there is a much greater probability of a division in an assembly of three hundred than of twenty-one. The former shortly will be the number of Electors; the latter is the number of States at present. The mode of election, if left to the States, permits only twenty-one bodies of Electors, and therefore, as far as the question of division is concerned, furnishing only twenty-one Electors; for, by the general ticket, there can be no division in the State vote, whereas there will be shortly three hundred Electors, who, in addition to sectional considerations, common to both, have all the seeds of division which such an unconnected mass always carries within its bosom.

So much of the amendment as still retains to the States the right of electing two Electors, independent of its incongruity, I would say, but for personal respect to the mover of the proposition, was an insult to the States. What does it avail New York, when, by districting her, you have shorn her of her real strength; when you have spoiled her of the substance, to leave this effigy of her former power? Nay, sir, by this very arrange, the weight of the small States is increased. Delaware sends two by districts and elects two by her Legislature. Her vote must always be three to one; generally, an undivided vote. New York—and so with the large States generally—if divided into districts, and Electors of different parties, or candidates, should be elected, will not be able to weigh as much in the scale.

But why this incongruity? Either divide the State into districts equal to her Electors, or leave it as it is, and pretend not to compensate for the rights which you take by so insignificant a boon as the one held out.

The honorable gentleman has entered into a long and intricate calculation to show that a minority may elect the President under the present arrangement. If the fact be admitted, what is the advantage gained by his argument? When the States are districted, may not the same result happen? And if the election is in the House of Representatives, to be decided by States, will not an insignificant portion of the people of the United States have the election in their hands? In illustration of the first suggestion, take the State of New York, divide it into south and north; the former shall be unanimous in favor of A, and shall have thirteen districts; the latter shall in each district be equally divided, save one casting vote, in favor of B: hence it will result that although nearly three-fourths of New York are in favor of A, yet B will have a majority. In proof of the latter suggestion, we need only refer to the representation of eleven of the small States in the House of Representatives, equal to thirty-six members, yet eleven being the majority of twenty-one, the whole number of the States, would have power to decide the election against the express will of four-fifths of the United States. The fact is, that a consequence of this kind, if extreme cases be admitted, is inseparably incident to every election made by Electors taken from the different divisions of the territory. In one section they may be unanimous, in another a majority of one may weigh through the Electors, whose election his vote has decided equally with thousands in another territory. This position is too plain to require further elucidation, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman will be as subject to its influence as the present arrangement.

But the principal ground upon which the gentleman rests his argument is, that it will avoid intrigue and foreign influence. If this were true of intrigue, then, indeed would the gentleman have a right to challenge a unanimous vote, not only here but through the nation. As to foreign influence, I have no apprehension. I have no belief that all the money in the bowels of the earth would be able to corrupt the Legislatures, or a majority of them, of the twenty-one States. If ever that time should arrive, it will be of but little avail what we shall this day do. The people will no longer be fit for a free government, and whatever may be written in the Constitution will not weigh against the dust of the balance.

That ambitious men will always exist, and who will seek to gratify their views by the most irregular efforts, is readily admitted. That the Presidential chair should be guarded against their approach, by every precaution which human wisdom can devise, is equally true. With these admissions, which I most freely make, permit me to inquire where these efforts are likely to have the greatest effect? Upon the Legislatures of the States, composed of thousands, or on the House of Representatives, when voting by States, where one man, by being the only Representative of a State, has a vote which, in effect, will weigh against a million of inhabitants whose delegation is limited also to one vote? The alarms of the honorable gentleman are alive only to the danger of the corruption of the many of the State Legislature, but are perfectly quieted as to the possibility of the corruption of one, if he be a member of the House of Representatives. He takes, therefore, all power from the former, lest they should be the instruments of intrigue or foreign influence, while he rejects, with a species of horror, any curtailments of the power of the latter, as violating the sacred principles of the compact between the States, and rejects all apprehension of the attempts of intrigue and foreign influence in that quarter as chimerical; and yet the honorable gentleman has resorted to the only occasion which has ever occurred of a devolution of the election on the House of Representatives furnishing much aid in support of his proposed amendment. Had I resorted to it in support of my amendment to cause the election to be decided by plurality of votes, I should have thought it conclusive; but that the gentleman should attempt to enlist it in support of his, is truly astonishing. What, sir, when on that occasion an attempt was made disgraceful, wicked, and alarming, to place a President in office who had not received one vote for that office, and thirty odd ballots were taken before the question was decided, a question which depended upon the fidelity of one or two individuals representing States which gave them one vote, what can create more surprise than that an incident of this kind should be brought into view, in support of an amendment the inevitable consequences of which will be, as I have already attempted to show, frequently to produce the possibility, at least, of a similar scene? I would to God that over this melancholy part of our annals the mantle of forgetfulness could forever rest; but as that is a desperate hope, let us, if possible, draw good out of evil, by profiting by the lesson it inculcates. Let us, instead of multiplying the chances of its recurrence apply a direct remedy, and cut up the evil by the roots.

As the honorable gentleman has justly and, I may add, without flattery, eloquently, depicted the consequences which were hanging on that event, it behooves him to unite with me in interposing barriers against its repetition. Here it is that intrigue will address itself. One man may be corrupted—millions cannot. That corruption did not take place, and, as a consequence, that

Burr was not elected as President, was not because the tempter did not present himself, but because there were, at that time, no Judases to accept the bribe. For we have been told by a then member, in a public memorial at this session, that the chief priests offered him not thirty but some hundred pieces of silver, not indeed to betray the Saviour of mankind, but what was only second in importance, the political salvation of this country, and, with it, that of the world. If the prophecy of the gentleman should be fulfilled, that, as we advance in age, we shall advance in corruption, under similar circumstances some Iscariot may be found who will sell his soul to perdition and his country to ruin. I will submit therefore to the decision of the Senate, without further comment, whether the amendment I propose, or that of the gentleman's, is most likely to protect us from a repetition of this disgraceful scene. The honorable gentleman has endeavored to excite our alarms by representing that, with the expansion of the Republic, intrigue will increase, and its effects be more violent and destructive. We have been presented with our future fate in the catastrophe of Rome. I abhor, as sincerely as the gentleman from New Jersey or any other, every species of intrigue; yet I will not surrender myself to any unnecessary fears from the example of ancient times; there is no point of resemblance; here, power is distributed through an almost boundless empire; there, it was confined to a single city filled with fit materials on which for the ambitious demagogue to act. To gain an ascendancy in Rome was to conquer the world; here, however, though our metropolis might be agitated, if Cæsar himself were to be the master spirit by which it was produced, its effect on this great Republic would be as impotent as the zephyr playing on the bosom of that ocean which prescribes our limits to the West.

The honorable gentleman, with a prophetic spirit, though I pray God not a true one, has concluded his remarks by exhibiting a frightful picture of our ultimate destiny, in the execution of which he has dipped his pencil in colors of the darkest dye—a corrupt people, a servile Representation, a timid Senate, like that of Tiberius, recording edicts only of blood to gratify the tyrant in the person of some successful military chieftain; these, he tells us, are the dreadful consequences of a rejection of his proposition. If this is the condition which, under any circumstances, awaits us, it is but idle to deliberate upon Constitutional questions. The successful usurper will give himself but little trouble in consulting its provisions—his sword, like that of Alexander's, will cut the gordian knot. It is to this instrument he will appeal for the extent of his powers. To these unhallowed auguries, I make this reply: That, if it be the will of Providence to give up this happy land, this last abode of freedom, to become a den of despots, and to surrender to their ruthless hands that liberty, without which life ceases to be a blessing, then, I pray, most fervently pray, the great disposer of Military Roads.

YAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Daggett, Eaton, Eppes, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Leake, Macon, Mellen, Morrill, Palmer, Roberts, Smith, Stokes, Talbot, Tichenor, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Crittenden, Dickerson, Forsyth, Fromentin, Hunter, Johnson, Lacock, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Taylor, Thomas, Van Dyke, and Wilson.

The VICE PRESIDENT gave the casting vote. The following is a sketch of the remarks with which he prefaced his vote on this occasion:

If the clause proposed to be expunged embraced the Constitutional question which has been made the subject of discussion in the Committee, I should deem this decision of great responsibility and importance. But I do not perceive that this, or any other Constitutional principle, is involved in the clause under consideration. It imparts no new powers, nor gives any definite directions to the Executive Department of the Government, with regard to fatigue duty of the army or military roads; but merely appropriates ten thousand dollars to pay the non-commissioned officers and privates of the army for that portion of their labor which may be performed on military roads in 1819. The proper department will, of course, be governed in the expenditure of that sum by a just construction of the clause with reference to the objects of the bill to the Constitution of the United States, and to the provisions of previously existing laws.

Even, if the opinion were tenable, that no antecedent laws have vested the President of the United States with a discretion of devoting a part of the fatigue duty of the army, or of appropriations for the Quartermaster's department, to the formation or repair of military roads, this clause would be unobjectionable and harmless; because no lawful application of the money granted by it could take place until further legislative provision should be made on the subject.

Without insisting on the Constitutional prerogatives of the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, or upon the express powers to make public roads through Indian territory and elsewhere, frequently granted by Congress, the Legislature of the nation has repeatedly conferred the authority of applying the labor of the Army and general appropriations to the objects contemplated in this section; for, when they give to the Executive plenary powers to effect any certain and legal public object, the right to employ all lawful means to accomplish that object is necessarily implied and conferred. Thus the law which enjoins on the President the erection of fortifications, implies and comprehends the right to procure the title and jurisdiction of eligible sites; to build wharves, bridges, and edifices; to improve the navigation of waters, and to open or repair the roads, indispensable to the occupation of those sites, for the accommodation of the persons employed in the works, and for the conveyance and landing of materials to construct, munitions to equip, of troops to garrison, and of provisions to supply those fortifications. Roads of this description are military roads, within the purview of the bill before the committee. In like manner, under the laws which impose on the Executive the duty of guarding and securing our remote frontier, when it becomes indispensable to that end to occupy posts on Indian tracts, or beyond inhabited territory, the right to open and make roads of access to such posts is clearly implied and granted. These, also, may be denominated military roads, on which this appropriation may, with propriety, be expended. In various other instances similar powers are incidental to, and comprehended in, general provisions. In this community none other can be tolerated, at the present time, as military roads, than such as may be made by the Army, and are indispensable to the accomplishment of some present military object, sanctioned by the Constitution and the laws already enacted. In pursuance of this exposition, without any express provision for the purpose, a part of the labor of the Army, and of the general appropriation for the Quartermaster's department, have been judiciously, and, in my opinion, legally, devoted, for a number of years past, to the construction and repair of roads of this description. To such roads, and to such only, the Executive, on a sound and legal construction of the section, notwithstanding its departure, in phraseology, from the grants of money heretofore made for, and applied to, the same purposes, will be restricted in the application of this appropriation. If that be conceded to be the extent of the import of the clause before us, there can be no solid objection to its retention in the bill; and I therefore request the Secretary to take my decision, of the motion to strike out, in the negative.

EXPORTATION OF DOMESTIC COINS.

Mr. TALBOT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the exportation of the gold, silver, and copper coins of the United States, made the following report, which was read:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a resolution to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the exportation of the gold, silver, and copper coins of the United States, report:

That, the measure contemplated in the resolution intimately connecting itself with the fiscal concerns of the nation, the committee, through their chairman, addressed a note to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting his opinion of the propriety of adopting measures for the attainment of the object in contemplation; from whom they received in reply a communication, (which accompanies this report, with the arguments and opinions expressed in which, those of your committee substantially correspond.

Of the inefficiency, if not entire impotence of legislative provisions to prevent the escape of the precious metals beyond the territorial limits of the Government, the history of all countries in which the power of legislation has been thus exercised, bears testimony. And, if all the efforts of arbitrary power in despotic Governments, if regulations dictated by the most cautious and jealous policy, guarded by penalties and punishments the most cruel and sanguinary, and enforced with a rigor which knows no mitigation, have been in vain, what hope can be indulged that a Government like ours—the genius and spirit of which breathes mildness and moderation—a country in which cruel and unusual punishments are unknown—could find the means of obtaining, by this mild spirit of legislation, this desirable end? Indeed, no error seems more entirely renounced and exploded, if not by the practice of all nations, at least in the disquisitions of political economists, than that which supposed that an accumulation of the precious metals could be produced in the dominions of one sovereign by regulations prohibiting their exportation to those of any other. The evils resulting to the community from a scarcity, or too small a portion of the precious metals, seem to your committee to be too deeply seated to yield to any remedies within the competency of legislation to afford. It is a malady which admits of no cure but that of time, patient industry, and persevering economy. As long as the balance of trade is against us, so long will a constant efflux of the precious metals be required for the discharge of such balance.

From this axiom in commerce, the correctness of which, it is believed, never was questioned, it follows that it remains with the people themselves to adjust this balance, and to produce a preponderance in favor of our own country. Highly favored as they are by the bounty of Providence; blessed with a country of unparalleled fertility; with soil, climate, and situation almost infinitely diversified; with capacities of rivaling every quarter of the globe in the agricultural productions, as well as in the perfection of their manufactures, raw materials for which are so abundantly furnished them within the bosom of their own country; aided by a moderate and wise economy in a limited enjoyment of foreign luxuries—with these advantages, duly appreciated and fully improved, to what elevated condition in their intercourse with foreign nations may they not aspire? To the protection of our domestic manufactures by the imposition of duties on foreign importations, the National Government seemed to have gone as far as sound policy would warrant or permit; the present tariff having been framed with a view as well of raising the requisite supply of revenue for the support of Government, as, by the amount of the duties imposed on foreign articles of manufacture, to enable our own manufacturer of similar articles to meet the importer of such foreign manufactures, in our own market, on terms of fair and equal competition.

Further than this, it would seem to your committee, the Congress of the United States ought not to go. To commercial enterprise, to the sagacity of this class of the community, sharpened by the keen sense of interest, and enlightened by long experience, it should be left to explore the old, or, seeking new channels of commerce, find out the most profitable markets for the productions of our native and domestic industry, and to bring us in exchange such of the productions of foreign climates, and of foreign labor, as our citizens are willing to purchase. In short, it is the opinion of your committee that commerce is always destined to flourish most where it is permitted to pursue its own paths, marked out by itself, embarrassed as little as possible by legislative regulations or restrictions.

From these considerations your committee are induced to recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient for Congress to adopt any regulations for preventing the exportation of the gold, silver, or copper coins of the United States.

JANUARY, 1819.

Exportation of Domestic Coins.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 29, 1818.

SIR: In reply to your letter, enclosing the resolution of the Senate, of the 2d instant, instructing the Committee of Finance "to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the exportation of the gold, silver, and copper coins of the United States," I have the honor to state that, from the best consideration which I have been able to bestow upon the subject, it would be inexpedient to adopt the measure at this time: 1st, because it cannot be rendered effectual; and 2d, that, so far as it may be rendered effectual, it will operate in favor of the corrupt part of the community, and injuriously to the fair and conscientious merchant. The latter position is so manifestly true, that no argument will be offered in its favor.

In support of the first position, the experience of other States furnishes the most irrefutable evidence. During the dark ages, and those which immediately followed the revival of letters, arts, and commerce, in Europe, the exportation not only of the current coin of the respective States, but of the precious metals generally, was prohibited, under the most sanguinary penalties. This general prohibition, yielding to the progress of reason, and to the advancement made in the science of political economy during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, has been gradually reduced in most of the States of modern Europe, to the gold and silver coins of the respective States. According to the testimony of the most enlightened men of every State, for the last century, the absolute inefficacy of this modified prohibition, as a permanent measure, has been satisfactorily established.

By the immutable laws of commerce, the exportation of the precious metals must necessarily depend upon the general balance of trade, in despite of any municipal regulation which human ingenuity can devise, or human power execute, short of wresting from individuals the possession of it. As a general principle, it may be safely asserted, that the State which imports merchandise to a greater amount than it exports, must pay the balance in the precious metals. In free States, where public credit is firmly established, and moneyed institutions founded upon just principles, and wisely administered, it is admitted that balances may be for some time adjusted without the aid of specie, by transferring to the creditor interest-bearing securities, such as funded debt and bank stock. It needs, however, no effort of reason to determine that this means of adjusting balances must not only be limited in its extent, but injurious to the party which resorts to it, as it uniformly tends to increase and perpetuate the balance to the extent of the interest which is annually payable to the creditor.

But it may possibly be contended, that however inefficient the measure may be, as a permanent regulation, yet there are conjunctures in the affairs of every State which not only justify, but imperiously require its temporary adoption.

It cannot be denied that the history of our own Government strongly countenances this distinction. During the embargo of 1807-'8, and that of 1812, the exportation of specie of every description was rigidly prohibited by law. Admitting, for the purpose of this inquiry, the correctness of this decision, it may be proper to determine whether our political or commercial relations with foreign States, or our internal affairs, presents a case which calls for the temporary adoption of the measure. According to general appearances, it is believed that our relations with foreign States have at no period of our national existence furnished less cause of inquietude.

The vexations to which our commerce was subjected by the principal belligerent nations, prior to the commencement of the late war; its almost total suspension during the war, and the irregularities and vicissitudes incident to its resumption on the return of peace, have doubtless produced the most serious embarrassments and losses. At this time, however, there is just reason to believe that these irregularities have ceased; that commerce has resumed its customary channels; and that the enterprising and prudent merchant will hereafter enjoy fair and reasonable profits. The rate of exchange between this country and the commercial States of Europe, is a sufficient security against the exportation of the gold and silver coins of the United States to those States. The exportation of specie to the East Indies is the only circumstance connected with our commercial intercourse with other States, which can be supposed to require the temporary prohibition of the exportation of the current coin of the United States. It is believed that this trade has been prosecuted more extensively by the merchants of the United States, since the late war, than anterior to that period. The extent to which it will be prosecuted in succeeding years, will depend upon the extent to which sales can be profitably made of the articles imported, and the practicability of obtaining the necessary amount of specie for its prosecution. Should the civil war which has for some time existed between Spain and the independent Governments in the Spanish American provinces be prosecuted for any considerable time longer, it is probable that there will be a general appreciation of the precious metals in the civilized world, and that the drain of the East Indies may not only be greatly diminished, but that they may be imported from thence into Europe and the United States. But there is no rational probability that in either event the pressure upon the community, which has produced this inquiry, will be temporary in its nature, or that it will yield to any temporary legislative expedient. It will be removed only when our importations shall be reduced below our exportations of merchandise to a greater extent than the amount of specie exported to the East Indies. Until this should be the case the pressure will continue, even should the quantity of the precious metals in general circulation be greatly increased. Whether the quantity be great or small, no part of it will permanently remain in a State against which there is an annual balance of trade, unless the coin of such State should be so adulterated as to destroy its currency. If these views be correct, we must look to the state of our internal affairs for circumstances which may justify a temporary prohibition of the exportation of the gold and silver coin of the United States. That the currency is disordered, and that much embarrassment is felt in the fiscal transactions of the Government, has been stated in the annual report of the Treasury. In the Spring of 1817 the principal banks in the commercial cities, in conjunction with the Bank of the United States, resumed specie payment. The example was ostensibly followed by the immense number of local banks established in the interior of the Atlantic States. In the Western States, specie payments were also resumed by the banks established before the refusal to pay specie, in 1814.

In making the effort to restore the currency to an equality with gold and silver, the banks were seconded by the community, which manifested a laudable forbearance to demand specie for the bank notes which formed the general circulation. This forbearance, however, could not be expected to continue after the banks had had time to regulate their paper circulation, according to the quantity of specie in their vaults. In the meantime the Bank of the United States, and some of the State banks, made considerable efforts to import specie. The exportation of it, during the same period, has, it is believed, been equal, if not greater than the importation by the banks and by individuals. It is presumed that the banks will not continue their exertions to import specie, but leave that to be effected by the commercial interest, which alone can bear the expense; but which will certainly not do it, so long as it shall be done by the banks. When the banks cease to import, they must withdraw their paper from circulation to a very great extent, or stop payment. The demand for a circulating currency must be made imperious before it will be imported to any considerable extent by the commercial interest. It is only when gold and silver shall form a large proportion of the circulating medium of the nation that the currency can be said to be sound. Since the resumption of specie payments, in the Spring of 1817, this has not been the case. What specie there was in the country has remained in the vaults of the banks until it has been drawn by the brokers, to be sold to the exporting merchant. It has not entered into the general circulation; and there is just reason to fear that much time will elapse before it does. What was the result of forbearance in the first instance, has been effected since by the operations of interest or of fear. If specie could be freely drawn by the exporting merchant from the vaults of the banks, at par, he would not pay the brokers eight or ten per cent. premium.

Bank stock, especially in the Eastern, Middle, and some of the Western States, forms so great a portion of the property of the wealthy and influential classes of society, that the interest of the banks is that of the whole community. The exporter of specie has, therefore, to choose between the hostility of the community and the payment of a premium upon the specie which he exports. There is even just reason to apprehend, that where banks shall stop payment, they may be permitted, by public opinion, in some parts of the Union, to continue to circulate their notes. Should this apprehension be realized, and the evil should be extended to different sections of the country, the currency could not fail to be vitiated in an extreme degree, unless the National or State Governments should adopt measures necessary to repress it. Against evils of this nature, the prohibition of the exportation of the gold and silver coins of the United States would furnish no relief. Nor is it conceived that this measure can, in any degree, repress or alleviate the sufferings of the community, resulting from the excessive multiplication of banks, and consequent inundation of bank paper which it was manifest could not be converted into specie at the will of the holder. If the banks shall be constrained by law, by public opinion, or by a correct knowledge of their interest, to stop their discounts when they cease to discharge their notes in specie when demanded, and confine their exertions exclusively to the collection and payment of their debts, the evils which now oppress society will be gradually diminished, and the currency everywhere will become equal to gold and silver. But, during this process, and after it shall be terminated, property of every description will be greatly diminished in value; and especially that which is fixed and permanent in its nature. In the liquidation of the existing debts, the relation of debtor and creditor will be sensibly changed in favor of the latter, who will be paid in money of greater intrinsic value than was received by the former. But this is an evil which necessarily results from fluctuations in the currency of every State, and cannot be charged upon the Government, which in the present case will be most seriously affected.

It is, however, conceived that a paper currency, founded upon a metallic basis, is more liable to sudden and violent fluctuations than one which is purely metallic. In the present state of the precious metals in general circulation, a metallic currency, it is confidently believed, could not be simultaneously resumed by the different States of the civilized world. We are then compelled, under existing circumstances, to continue a paper currency, founded upon a metallic basis, with all its liability to sudden and violent fluctuations, aggravated by the circumstance that more than twenty different sovereignties claim and exercise the right of increasing, ad libitum, that currency, through the instrumentality of banking institutions. These circumstances, together with the drain of specie produced by the East India trade, present the most serious obstacles to the preservation of the currency at an equal value to gold and silver. These obstacles now exist in, perhaps, their greatest force. The practicability of preserving the convertibility of bank notes into current specie, under circumstances so extremely adverse, is in a fair course of experiment. Whatever may be the result of this experiment, until it is obtained, no legislative interference is conceived to be necessary, except for the enforcement of the obligation on the part of the banks to discharge their notes in specie, when demanded. This can be most certainly effected by considering and punishing, as an act of bankruptcy, any attempt on the part of a bank to circulate its notes whilst it refuses to discharge them in specie, or the notes of other banks in the same situation.

I have the honor to be sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. J. W. EPPES,
Chairman Committee of Finance.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, Mr. MACON in the chair, the bill to prescribe the mode of commencing, prosecuting, and settling controversies between two or more States, and after some time spent thereon, the Committee rose, and the Senate adjourned.

CONTROVERSIES BETWEEN STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill prescribing the mode of commencing, prosecuting, and deciding controversies between two or more States.

A motion was made to strike out the words, in the first section, "or any other matter proper to be decided in a judicial way."

Mr. TALBOT spoke in favor of the bill, generally, while he gave his assent to the amendment, to obviate the objections of some gentlemen to the bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN gave into the amendment from the same motive as his colleague, and was willing the bill should be confined to controversies respecting territorial limits.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, thought the bill unnecessary, in any respect, as the dispute between the States of Tennessee and Kentucky respecting limits could be settled without it; but he should be much less opposed to the bill if this amendment took place.

Mr. FROMENTIN was opposed to the amendment. He thought the Constitutional provision on the subject was meant to embrace all controversies between States, as well as those relating to boundary. He thought it the duty of Congress to pass the law; and he did not believe any difficulty would arise in carrying it into effect. He wished the provisions of the bill as general as possible, with a view to prevent all quarrels and applications of force to redress real or supposed injuries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EPES declared himself hostile to the bill, and moved to postpone it indefinitely. He believed this bill could only be executed by military force. The principles he contended for were ably supported in the work entitled "The Federalist." He would rather, had a motion to strike out the first section been in order, that the question should have been taken directly on the merits of the bill, to decide whether a provision of the Constitution, which had lain inactive for thirty years, should now be called into action. Congress had shrunk from the exercise of the power to district the States; and he thought this bill much more dangerous, and likely to produce disturbance, than that. The power to suspend the habeas corpus act had never been exercised. This wise course ought to be adhered to in the present case. This bill was calculated to increase discontent and suspicion. Mr. E. here read an extract from the Federalist, page 93, late edition, corroborating his idea, that a decree against a sovereign State could not be enforced but by the sword. The power of the Federal Court, said Mr. E., to try suits between an individual and a State has been expunged. With a few more observations, Mr. E. submitted the motion he had made.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said, the same course had been pursued at the last session as was now proposed, and if this motion now prevailed, it must be considered as a rejection of the bill. The State of Kentucky had addressed a memorial to Congress in favor of such a measure as was proposed by the bill, and he deemed it a duty to submit the reasons which occurred to him in support of it. Under the Constitution, power was given to Congress to make the provisions contemplated by this bill. Why tremble at the exercise of this power? There must be authority somewhere to settle disputes between States; and where would it be lodged so safely as in the national Judiciary? He believed no ground of alarm or apprehension existed. The greatest and proudest States in the Union would cheerfully submit to the decision of that tribunal any litigation between them. The States would be sued by their consent, as they had given their consent to the provision of the Constitution authorizing this law; and they could not, therefore, complain of any violation of their sovereignty or independence. He said, he deemed it essential to the perpetuity of our Union, that this power should have been given, and that it should be exercised. The very author which the gentleman had quoted supported this provision in the Constitution, by example and reason. The objections came from those States likely to be made defendants under this act, and from the great and powerful State of Virginia. This provision was meant to protect the small States against the large. And have we come to this, that the large and proud States shall threaten resistance to a Constitutional law? He hoped such threats would not terrify us into an abandonment of this power. He appreciated the high and honorable motives of the gentleman from Virginia; but he thought his apprehensions unfounded and visionary. He believed the judgment of the Supreme Court, as now limited, would execute itself silently and effectually. There was no danger of the necessity of employing military force. The States could not settle their disputes amicably themselves, without the mediation of a disinterested tribunal. Virginia and Pennsylvania had all but come to open war, on a territorial difference. Was this the quariter in modo which ought to be pursued in settling boundaries? And such a dispute would not now be settled so easily between those potent States. Suppose Kentucky should give up its claim rather than come to open war, would it be right for the General Government to see her stripped of her rights? She had no alternative but to do this, or appeal to the sword. Would it be just or magnanimous to refuse to exercise this power, and thus permit such wrongs to be done? Though proud of his State and of her character, he should not deem her disgraced by being made a defendant under this law, or by submitting to the decision of the Supreme Court. He wished such a high tribunal could be erected to settle all disputes between nations, and oblige proud and ambitious nations to submit to just and equitable terms of settlement. And should we, of one flesh and blood, quarrel among ourselves, when so easy a remedy is in our power? New Jersey has her disputes; Rhode Island has her disputes; and, if they are wrong, is there any honorable gentleman who would not wish to see them righted?

Mr. ORIS did not mean, he said, to attempt any reply to the honorable gentleman. In many of his opinions he concurred, and almost all his objections were obviated by the restrictions in the bill. He thought, however, some further restrictions were necessary; which he pointed out. He should not have risen, however, but for doubts whether this bill could be constitutionally passed. This bill provided for a suit being brought in the nature of a bill of equity. He asked whether it was competent for this Legislature to exclude the trial by jury, in cases alluded to in the bill? Had we a right to say that the court alone should decide, without the intervention of a jury? The provision of the Constitution was general, and applied as well to States as individuals. He thought the bill also ought not to operate on disputes which originated fifty or sixty years ago. Without a limitation in this case, he should vote against the bill. He thought the bill ought to be recommitted, if this motion should not be carried, for the purpose of making the amendments he had suggested.

Mr. EPES admitted that the right of the Supreme Court to act as provided in this bill was sanctioned in another part of the book he had quoted; but it was there expressly laid down that a decree could only be executed by the sword. We had found, by experience, that this authority could not be carried into effect without force; and the best and safest course was for States to settle their own disputes. Between individuals judicial decisions would be easily carried into effect, but between communities and independent States they could not but by force.

Mr. BURRILL made some explanations of certain provisions of the bill, and intimated some amendments which he meant to propose, to obviate objections which had been made.

Mr. MELLEN said, he had an objection to the bill, but might be mistaken in his views, and, if so, was subject to correction. The bill was to settle disputes concerning territory; this could not be by a suit in equity. These must be settled as questions of law. Does Kentucky or Tennessee own certain property? This was certainly a question of law. Further, the bill only provides for amicable suits in equity; whereas he believed the remedy ought to be by a real suit at law. Mr. M. made some further observations in illustration of his objections.

Mr. EATON thought it unnecessary to go into the details of the bill, until the question of postponement was decided. He was opposed to the bill, because, though the power was vested in Congress, it was not prudent or expedient to exercise it. Had this law existed during the dispute between Virginia and Pennsylvania, it might not have been settled as well as it was by the two States. This law was certainly intended to answer a local purpose—to decide a dispute between Tennessee and Kentucky; and, in its consequences, might lead to heart-burnings and outrages. He apprehended, from the number interested in this dispute, serious contests would arise from it. The Constitution had, he confessed, given the right; but it did not follow that it was wise or safe to exercise it. Congress had prudently declined, for nearly thirty years, to exercise this power; and he thought this was a salutary and useful lesson to us. He thought this bill was calculated to produce discord among the States; but, by closing your doors against such disputes, they will be amicably adjusted. He thought it prudent, and just, and proper, to refuse to pass this bill.

Mr. TALBOT hoped the motion to postpone would be withdrawn, that a direct vote might be had upon the bill; that Kentucky might know what to rely on, and how to act. He thought this provision of the Constitution wise, and benevolent, and parental; and that it was peremptory. He thought Congress was bound to pass this law; that no election was given to Congress; that when a dispute has arisen, and Congress have been called on by a State to exercise this power, they were under a moral obligation to pass it. For many years this controversy had existed; all efforts to settle it between themselves had failed; and he saw no hope of its being adjusted, unless this bill passed. He looked forward with fearful anticipations of evil, unless the national tribunal were authorized to decide the dispute. He saw no resort but to force—to the sword—if Congress did not interfere; and he deprecated the defeat of this bill, as leading to a serious contest. He was not afraid of any attempt to resist any decree of the Supreme Court, by any State, however powerful, however proud, however haughty. He hoped the motion would be withdrawn, and a motion made to strike out the first section.

Mr. EPPES said he would have great pleasure in complying with the wish of his friend from Kentucky, but that he thought the motion to postpone amounted to the rejection of the bill. Mr. E. replied to some of the arguments which had been advanced in favor of the bill. Let the two States allude to settle their own disputes; and let us not, for a single case, bring every State at the footstool of the Federal Judiciary.

Mr. LACOCK thought it would be best to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction in the case immediately in question, and not make the bill general in its provisions. He was willing to provide for the dispute between Kentucky and Tennessee; but this bill was not called for from any other portion of the Union. It might revive old disputes, and create great evils. He did not want to renew the disputes between Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and between New Jersey and New York, about Staten Island, the residence of the Vice President. He thought it much better to confine the provisions of the bill to the single object.

Mr. TALBOT was opposed to any limitation of this sort. He thought the provisions of the bill ought to be general. Mr. T. again went into a discussion of the question at large, and continued speaking for nearly an hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, read an extract from a law of Tennessee, proposing to Kentucky, to apply to the President of the United States to appoint a commissioner to settle the boundary line between the two States; and a law of Kentucky, repealing all laws on the subject of said line.

Mr. CRITTENDEN gave some explanation of these two acts, but deprecated the merits of this particular case from being brought into discussion.

The question on indefinite postponement was then taken by yeas and nays—yeas 14, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Eaton, Eppes, King, Lacock, Macon, Mellen, Palmer, Roberts, Sanford, Stokes, Tait, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

On motion of Mr. BURRILL, it was recommitted to the committee which reported it, for further consideration.

Mr. DICKERSON, subsequently, reported the resolution from the select committee, with an amendment striking out the following words, which had been heretofore added, as an amendment to the original resolution, viz: "and if the Legislature of any State shall fail to provide for the election of Representatives, as hereby required, Congress shall have power to provide for the same, in the manner prescribed by this article."

more States, (by referring them to the investigation and decision of the Supreme Court.)

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, offered an additional section, providing that the validity of private claims shall not be affected by any decree of the Supreme Court. Mr. W. offered sundry observations in support of this amendment; and was replied to by Mr. TALBOT, who denied the right of Congress to make such a provision.

Mr. WILLIAMS answered, that this principle had been already acted on by other States, in similar controversies, viz: Pennsylvania and Virginia, and Virginia and Tennessee, and that it was consistent with justice and equity.

Mr. CRITTENDEN followed, with arguments against the power of Congress to adopt this provision; as it was a question for judicial decision, or for legislative provisions of the contending States.

Mr. WILLIAMS replied, and attempted to show that it was both competent and expedient for Congress to make the provision he had proposed.

Mr. TALBOT again spoke against the amendment, on the ground of the incompetency of Congress to adopt such a provision; and as the two States could more properly and easily adjust private claims.

Mr. EATON spoke at some length in support of the motion of his colleague; and adduced arguments to prove the constitutionality and expediency of the provision.

The question was then taken on Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment, and lost, ten only rising in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, then moved an amendment, similar to the preceding in principle, but varying as to the time it was to take effect.

This amendment, Mr. W. said, he hoped would not be objected to by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said, this amendment was of the same import as the one just negatived. He therefore hoped the Senate would reject it, as they had done the former.

Mr. WILLIAMS spoke in support of his motion; and was replied to by Mr. TALBOT.

The motion was lost, nine only voting in the affirmative.

Sundry amendments were made to the bill; when

Mr. EPPES moved so to amend the bill as to confine its operation to the controversy between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee; and offered sundry reasons in support of his motion.

Mr. BURRILL opposed the motion, on the ground that if Congress had the right to legislate in this case, they had in all other similar cases; and that it was better to legislate for all cases at this time, than to legislate in detail, as cases may arise. The latter he deemed both unconstitutional and inexpedient.

Mr. EPPES replied, that the gentleman's arguments, if they proved anything, proved too much; as he himself had consented to limit the exercise of the general power given to Congress, to the particular case of disputed boundaries.

Mr. EPPES's motion was then carried, 18 to 16.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, moved to postpone the bill to the 5th of March next, (reject it;) which motion was agreed to by the following vote, and the bill rejected:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Eaton, Eppes, Forsyth, Goldsborough, King, Macon, Morrill, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Tait, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson—20.

The resolution to cause a certain line to be run and marked from the Tennessee river to the Mississippi river, was read the second time.

The Senate then took up, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. BARBOUR in the chair, and spent some time in the consideration of the bill for adjusting claims to land, and establishing land offices in the district east of the island of Orleans. Before getting through the bill, it was laid over until to-morrow.

The bill to continue in force the act to regulate the currency of certain foreign coins, was taken up; and Mr. EPPES having explained the motives for certain provisions of the bill which limits the currency of foreign gold coins to the first of November next, and continuing the currency of certain foreign silver coins for two years longer, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the election of a delegate from the Michigan Territory, to the Congress of the United States, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of said Territory," together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands; and the amendment having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, it was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time, as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President and Managers of the Rockville and Washington Turnpike Road Company, of the State of Maryland, to extend and make their turnpike road to or from the boundary of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, through the said district to the line thereof;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

SICK SEAMEN.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for sick and disabled seamen; constituting a general fund out of the moneys which have been, or shall be, collected under the several acts on this subject, and forming a board of commissioners of the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, for its administration.

The bill provides that, from the thirtieth of September next, there shall be required of each seamen employed in the registered vessels of the United States, the monthly contribution of — cents per month, for the general fund.

Mr. SANFORD moved to fill this blank with forty, and supported his motion on the general ground of the inadequacy of the present contribution of twenty cents from each seaman, to provide a sufficient fund for their relief when sick or disabled on shore; and that, as the principle of creating the fund in this manner had been sanctioned by long usage, it was proper to make it adequate to its object.

Mr. BURRILL approved the object, but did not think it right that the whole fund for this purpose should be raised by a tax on the seamen themselves; that a tax of forty cents a month was a very heavy poll tax; and he thought the public Treasury ought to contribute something towards this fund.

Mr. KING did not view this contribution in the light of an absolute poll-tax; the seamen would receive a part of it in increased wages from his owner, the owner from his employer, &c.; and the payment of the tax would thus, in some measure, spread itself through the community, and not fall wholly on the seaman, although for his benefit.

Mr. TAIT referred to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, stating the inadequacy of the present tax on the seamen to provide for their relief, and argued that, setting aside the consideration that it was for their own benefit, the increase was not unreasonable, when the depreciation of money, in twenty years, during which the contribution had remained unchanged, was taken into view; that, in all probability, the subject would not be touched again for twenty years to come.

The motion to fill the blank with forty cents was agreed to; and, the other provisions of the bill having been gone through, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, February 3.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Dozet and Antoine Bougard, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Joseph Dozet and Antoine Bougard; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to the second reading.

bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The bill entitled "An act to authorize the President and Managers of the Rockville and Washington Turnpike Road Company, of the State of Maryland, to extend and make their turnpike road to or from the boundary of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, through the said District to the line thereof," was read a third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The engrossed joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, so far as to provide a uniform mode (by districts) of electing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and Representatives to Congress, was read the third time.

Mr. DAGGETT stated briefly the reasons which should induce him to vote, as he had always voted, against the resolution, although now differently instructed on the subject by the Legislature of Connecticut.

Mr. FORSYTH moved that the resolution be recommitted, with instructions to strike out that part which prescribed the mode of electing Representatives to Congress, considering the two subjects entirely distinct, and, opposed as he was to the whole proposition, yet, divested of this feature, it would be to him less objectionable than with it.

This motion brought on some discussion not only of the proposed amendment, but of the general merits of the resolution; in which Mr. FORSYTH opposed it at some length, and Messrs. DICKERSON, MACON, and KING, supported it.

Mr. FORSYTH's motion was negatived without a division; and the question was then taken on the passage of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 10, as follows:

FRIDAY, February 5.

The PRESIDENT communicated to the Senate the annual report of the state of the Sinking Fund; and likewise a report of the Secretary of War, embracing a statement of moneys transferred during the late recess of Congress, by authority of the President of the United States, from one specific appropriation to another; which reports were read.

Mr. WILSON, of New Jersey, rose to make a motion, and said, that, in introducing the resolution he was about to offer, he thought it proper to observe, that, by a late return to this House, from the War Department, of the militia of the United States, it appeared, that from eight States and two Territories, no returns of the militia had been received for the last year. Should a requisition be made for a detachment of militia, from the several States and Territories, Government were thus deprived of correct data for properly apportioning their respective quotas. A great difficulty, Mr. W. said, must also be experienced in the equitable distribution of arms among the several States and Territories, under the act for arming the whole body of militia. He thought these evils required a remedy, and that Congress had ample means of applying one. He therefore submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making some further provision by law for insuring annual and accurate returns of the militia of the several States and Territories.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, of the 20th of April, 1818, transmitting a copy of the rules, regulations, and instructions, for the Naval service of the United States, and the resolution of the Senate instructing the committee in relation thereto, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President of the United States, report to the Senate, in the first week of the next session, whether the rules, regulations, and instructions, prepared by the Board of Navy Commissioners, in obedience to the act of the fifteenth of February, 1815, are conformable to existing laws, and, if there is any interference, wherein? And, if any, what further legislative provision may, in the opinion of the said Secretary, be necessary to give force and effect to the said rules, regulations, and instructions. And also, to report, as aforesaid, any other provision which the said Secretary may deem proper for the more perfect administration of any branch of the naval service.

The resolution was read.

On motion by Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee on the District of Columbia were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws existing in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, regulating the seizure and sale of persons of color suspected to be runaway slaves.

On motion by Mr. TICHENOR, the Committee on Pensions were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of War to place upon the pension list Abraham Edwards, a marine in the naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war; who is now insane, and in such reduced circumstances as to need the assistance of his country.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, who were instructed "to inquire into the expediency of so altering the laws respecting the sale of the public lands, that, from and after the 1st day of — next, credit shall not be given on such sales," made a report, accompanied by a bill, making further provision for the sale of public lands; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to the second reading.

The report is as follows:

That a view to the extensive territory placed at the disposal of the Government, the increasing demand for new lands for cultivation, arising from the progressive augmentation of the population in the United States, and the influence which the proposed alteration in the system for the sale of public lands must produce on the interests of a large portion of the community, give, in the opinion of the committee, more than ordinary importance to the inquiry which they are instructed to make.

From the connexion that the terms of credit have with the other provisions and conditions provided for the sale of the public lands, a correspondent alteration in the price and size of the tracts offered for sale, will be necessary, when the credit is discontinued on future sales. That provision, alone, would virtually operate an enhancement of the price, and lessen the facility to men of limited capital, of acquiring new lands for settlement and cultivation.

In this view, the committee have considered the expediency of providing for the discontinuance of credit, a reduction of the price, and a subdivision of tracts in future sales. The provisions for the sale of public lands now in force, with some subsequent alterations, were adopted by the act of the 10th day of May, 1800. By its general regulations, a credit is allowed on three-fourths of the purchase-money for the lands sold. The moneys credited may be retained by incurring the charge of simple interest, for five years, from the time of purchase. It would appear that, at the first sales under this law, the long term of credit allowed had induced excessive purchases. The term of credit on these sales expired in the year 1805; and in 1806 it became necessary for Congress to interpose for relief of the purchasers, to prevent extensive forfeitures for failure in payment; and, since that period, nine several acts have been passed for the relief of the purchasers of public lands; and these acts for mitigating the operation for the general provision of the law have been in force more than one half of the whole time since the system was first organized. The inducements of a long credit, which encourage purchases beyond the means for making payment, the general disposition in men to anticipate the most favorable results from the products of their labor, and the frequent unfavorable fluctuations in commerce, which cannot be foreseen by the most discerning, are the principal causes of the failures in payment by purchasers of public lands. It must appear from the Treasury statement, at the present session, of the amount of outstanding balances, on account of the sales of public lands, with the embarrassments arising from the deranged state of the currency, that any degree of punctuality in the payment of the debts now due is highly improbable. If the laws were left to operate in the rigid exactions of the penalties and forfeitures, the most serious injuries, (in the present circumstances of the country) must follow to a large class of the community; and the effect of relief, by an extension for the time for payment, while the sales continue to progress, may produce an accumulation of the debt, and increase the difficulty in making the final payments.

The experience for several years of the effects of this system, the frequent recurrence of circumstances which render necessary the interposition of the Legislature to mitigate the general operation of law, and the extensive forfeitures which have been incurred, notwithstanding the aid of frequent remedial laws for the relief of the purchasers, seem to forbid any calculation on a successful operation of the same system in future sales. It cannot be correct policy to persist in the continuance of a system so much affected by circumstances, as that under consideration; which requires the frequent aid of mitigating expedients to preserve its existence, and to prevent its oppressive effects on a considerable portion of the community. It is not believed that any of the acts for the relief of the purchaser of public lands were unnecessary indulgences. The unfavorable state of things, during the restrictions on our commerce, and the late war, rendered such measures necessary; and the present state of the currency presents claims for indulgence still more imperative. Judging from the experience of the past, without any assurance of a more favorable state of things in future, it may be concluded that the system of credit is not well adapted to the circumstances of the country, and will be injurious so long as commerce is liable to fluctuation. The allowance of credit on the sales of the public lands, could not have been adopted for the benefit of capitalists; to them it is unnecessary, and for them it ought not to have been provided. And yet it is believed that it has operated most to the disadvantage of men destitute of capital. An individual who takes the whole term of credit allowed by law, on the three last instalments of purchase money, is charged on the moneys credited more than ten per cent. per annum above the purchaser who makes prompt payment; and, in many instances, if he possess no other resources than those arising from the land itself, he incurs a forfeiture of the money paid, and the land, with its improvements. If the allowance of credit on future sales was abolished, every subsequent purchaser would, without any liability to error, be able to calculate his means for payment; and if his purchase should not be so extensive, he would at once become an independent landholder, secure and quiet in his possession. In future, those fertile sources of discontent and disquietude, which arise from disappointment, and from the exercise of measures necessary to enforce the payments, as also the frequent distress occasioned by the forfeiture of lands on which settlements have been made, would be avoided; and (as will be proposed) were the public lands offered for sale in tracts of eighty acres, at one dollar and fifty cents per acre, then any individual, on the payment of one hundred and twenty dollars, might acquire a freehold estate, without encumbering himself with any debt whatever. It is believed that an advantage to the general interest of the districts in which the public lands are sold, would result from discontinuing the credit on the sales. The purchaser is in possession of the lands purchased, for four or five years before the completion of his payment. The product of his labor, for that time, is applied in discharge of his debt, and passes into the Public Treasury. In as far as the instalments are collected in the district, it operates on the principle of rents collected, and withdrawn from circulation, or of a partial tax on that part of the community. The drain of money from circulation, thus occasioned, has been sensibly felt; and the balance in exchange against the Western country may, on this principle, be accounted for. In case of cash payments, the resources for payment would be drawn from other parts of the country, in as far as emigrants are the purchasers. In a more general point of view, the proposed measure appears important. The accumulation of debt, in particular districts, where the mass of citizens are the debtors, is a consequence attending the credit system. The principles of general policy require that charges on the people, for the necessary supply of revenue, should be diffused over the whole society; by adopting cash payments, this evil would be avoided; and the interest of subsequent purchasers would then be identified with that of the Government.

If credit shall not be allowed on the sale of the public lands, it is proposed that a corresponding reduction in the price shall be made. The public lands have ever been considered as a source of revenue to the Government, and the early regulations for their sale appear to have had that object principally in view. Several of the States ceded vacant territory to the United States, for the purpose of creating a fund for the discharge of the public debt. With this object in view, and to cover the considerable expenses of extinguishing the Indian title, and otherwise incidental to bringing the lands into market, the price was first fixed by general regulations at one dollar per acre, and subsequently increased to two. It would be difficult, without reference to any general principle of public policy, to fix any determined price, which, under all circumstances, would be proper for the sale of the public lands. The demand for new land to bring into cultivation will in some manner be proportioned to the increase of population in the agricultural class of the community. But the amount of sale will always depend (at any given price) on the capital destined to be so invested. The capital ordinarily employed for this object, is the surplus product of agricultural labor. If the profit in agricultural pursuits, so to be employed, will not purchase the supply of new lands necessary to the proper extension and prosecution of that important branch of national industry, it may then be fairly presumed that the price is excessive, and operates injuriously to the public interest. It is not alleged that the price at present fixed has produced that effect, but it is believed that it is much higher than has been required by any of the individual States, or in any other country, for vacant lands; and that the price required, connected with the credit allowed, has been found sufficiently high by the industrious class who are disposed to purchase, for the purpose of occupancy and improvement. Experience has exploded the opinion that injurious speculations might be discouraged, and monopolies prevented, by simply fixing a high price on the sale of the public lands; and if in any measure these salutary effects have been produced by that means, it has been at the expense of the corresponding disadvantage that, by the same means, the industrious class, with small capital, have been prevented from becoming purchasers, with a view to settlement and cultivation.

The only expedient which has been successfully resorted to, for preventing the public lands from being engrossed by capitalists, and perhaps the only one that will in any measure be effectual to that end, is the subdivision of the sections, and offering them for sale in small tracts, suited to the means of the purchaser, for actual settlement. And while ever a sufficient quantity of land is kept in market to satisfy the necessary demand arising from the increase of population in the country, and sold in small tracts to suit those who are disposed to purchase, for the purpose of occupying them, little may be apprehended from the evils of speculation and monopoly, whether the price be as now fixed, or shall be reduced.

The sales of lands are regulated by no other principle than that of any other traffic in any species of merchandise. While ever the market is fully supplied with any commodity, and a certainty that the supply can be kept up, and it is retailed in quantity and quality to suit the purchaser for use or consumption, monopolies will not be made, whether the price be high or low. A high price will discourage the consumption, and a low price promote it; but, while the price is steady, speculations will be unprofitable.

It has been alleged that discontinuing the credit and reducing the price would operate to the disadvantage of the poor; that they must be supplied on credit; and if it shall not be allowed by the Government, they must purchase at an advanced price from speculators. The idea of providing equal facility to the poor and to the rich, by any regulation, is incompatible with that of disposing of the land for a valuable consideration. While the Government requires a price, he who possesses the means of payment will have an advantage in making purchases over him who does not possess such means.

It is not apprehended that, speculations will be extensive, or be long continued, where they must be carried on by purchase for cash, and sale on credit, and when the sales must be confined to those who cannot advance one hundred and twenty dollars, and become purchasers from the United States.

From the foregoing consideration it is respectfully proposed that credit on future sales shall not be allowed; that the price of the public lands be fixed at one dollar and fifty cents; and that the lands be offered for sale in tracts of eighty acres.

And for that purpose they ask leave to report a bill.

DUELLING.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, submitted yesterday by Mr. MORRILL, to request the President to dismiss certain officers from service.

Mr. MORRILL addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, it is with no ordinary degree of sensation that I invite the attention of the Senate to the consideration of the resolution which I had the honor to present. The nature and enormity of the transaction can require but little illustration. It is not my intention to enter into a minute detail of the horror or magnitude of the crime; but, as I had the honor to offer the resolution, it may be expected that I assign some reasons in justification of the proposition. In the first place, sir, I consider the practice of duelling as inhuman. What can be more repulsive to the philanthropic breast than to place before a musket, charged with a ball, at the distance of twelve or fifteen feet, a fellow-citizen for a mark? Humanity shudders, every tender feeling of the heart recoils, and Pagan barbarity itself is put to the blush. But, sir, it is immoral. It tends to demoralize society and corrupt the community. It banishes accountability from the human mind. It represents life and death as of no consequence, and immaterial. It may sometimes deprive society of its useful members.

The practice is unjust and wicked. In consequence of capital offences, by a legal tribunal life may be taken. But shall one citizen, for any trivial offence, take the life of his fellow? It cannot be justified upon any correct principle whatever, either Christian, humane, or civil. Christianity breathes a better spirit; humanity retires with disgust; the civil code condemns and executes the offender. What law, human or divine, will sustain the act? The articles of war forbid it; State laws forbid it; Virginia herself has forbidden it.

But, sir, General Mason has fallen. A husband, a father, a son, thus prematurely ushered into eternity. And, unless invention and vice are more than ordinarily active, he received encouragement to the sad catastrophe in this city; and the more to be lamented, for, is this the case, his blood must, at least in part, rest upon the heads of his guilty abettors and counsellors.

Lamentable fact! that a gentleman of high standing, who had been a member of this honorable body, and probably would have been the next Governor of Virginia, should be so overcome with pride or with passion as to fall a sacrifice to sentiments so absurd. And, sir, what plausible apology is offered to mitigate the crime? The only plea which ingenuity itself can invent, is grounded upon a false notion of honor. A gentleman is bound by his honor to commit an act of murder. His honor must be sustained by the commission of an offence beneath the dignity of the human species. If this be a correct mode of sustaining a gentleman's honor, why is it prohibited in your army? Why are laws against it? If it will sustain the honor of an individual, it will sustain the honor of the community; the honor of your country; and why do your laws condemn that on which your country's glory is erected?

But, sir, it is a gentleman's way of deciding a controversy. Yes, and the servants; the boys in the street, by this practice, learn high notions of honor, and, to display them, must fight a duel. Base practice, indeed; repugnant to all the refined feelings of a cultivated mind. The better feelings of man revolt at the act. Conscience condemns it, and it must, in time and eternity. From this view of the subject, sir, I am induced to offer the resolution, and am led to hope it will be adopted by the Senate. Let this be as it may, I have discharged my duty; I have expressed my opinion without reserve.

Mr. BARBOUR addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President, the event to which the resolution relates has filled me with the deepest affliction. I claim the melancholy privilege of being the chief mourner here. Mason was my friend—a long and intimate acquaintance, ripened into a sincere friendship by an association in this body for several years, gave me an opportunity of appreciating his distinguished worth. Virginia loved him as one of her favorite sons—in war her shield, her ornament in peace. With her the very name had been consecrated to patriotism, through successive generations. Its lustre lost nothing in the person of the deceased. He united the amiable qualities of the man to the higher virtues of the patriot. His loss will be mourned by his country as a public calamity. In the vigor of life, uniting both the affection and confidence of all, and surrounded with every blessing that promised happiness, he has suddenly fallen the victim of a barbarous practice. Cut off in the commencement of a splendid career, he leaves a wretched mother, a disconsolate widow, a fatherless child, and a weeping country.

Oh, what a scene was there! But yesterday Selma was the abode of happiness; to-day it is wrapped in mourning. See on yesterday the affectionate husband, the amiable wife, the tender infant—the pledge and cement of their happiness. To-day, behold that husband carried into the presence of his wife, bathed in gore. See her, frantic with despair, precipitating herself upon the corpse of her bleeding husband, mingling her tears with his flowing blood, and contending with the icy arms of death for the lifeless prize. She lifts her eyes to Heaven, the last refuge of the wretched, and in tones of agony cries out, my God, my God, restore my husband! Her prayers are given to the winds; his disembodied spirit has found its refuge and its home in the bosom of its God, while his earthly remains are consigned to the cold and narrow house appointed for all the living. Peace be to his ashes! And may a kind Providence become the friend of the widow; pour balm into her afflicted bosom, and bind up the broken heart; be the father of the fatherless, and let him be the mother's prop; rock the cradle of her declining years, and be a consolation in her dying hour! If anything can now administer to the affliction of his surviving friends, it will be the knowledge that Virginia, this day, through all her borders, weeps his untimely fall.

As to the practice of duelling, I have already, long since, given proofs of my sentiments, more substantial than mere professions. Whatever credit, if any, be due to it, to me it belongs, of having first presented to the Legislature of my native State the law against duelling. What will be its result on society, all-trying time must decide. The best hopes of humanity are connected with its success; nor is it presumptuous to hope that Heaven may smile on our efforts.

And yet, sir, with these sentiments, I must still be opposed to the resolution under consideration. As to the rumors to which the mover refers, and on which he rests, in part, at least, the success of this motion, they may or may not be true. Incidents of this kind are generally attended with the most exaggerated statements. If, indeed, they be true, as represented, I should feel no hesitation in pronouncing them as deserving the deepest abhorrence. Of some of the persons concerned in this melancholy tragedy, I know nothing; with others I have a slight acquaintance. Their characters forbid the belief that they have acted dishonorably. The statement made by the mover, unsustained by proof, furnishes a strong reason against the adoption of the resolution. For it is palpably an ex parte proceeding, and we are called upon to consign to infamy men who have had no opportunity of being heard in their defence. Let us not multiply the regrets already attending this melancholy event, by doing an act of injustice. Let us not commit the dignity of the Senate, by taking cognizance of a subject which belongs to others. If a crime has been committed, the offenders are subject, if, as the resolution supposes, they be military men, to trial by court martial, and, in any event, by a civil tribunal. To the President, as Commander-in-Chief, belongs the former; the latter to the civil magistrate. By this irregular proceeding, should it prevail, we depart from our own duty, in prescribing to others, to whom of right the subject belongs, and of whose remissness there is no imputation. The crime of duelling is not to be corrected by a proceeding of this kind. The roots of the evil are too deep to be extirpated by a solitary paroxysm of zeal. Public opinion is the only corrective. No matter what may be the number or severity of penalties that are denounced against this ferocious practice; they, as experience has evinced, are inoperative, unless their enforcement can be secured by the coincidence of public sentiment, or unless, as with us, the law executes itself by disfranchising the offender. So long as public opinion requires of an individual a submission to what is most improperly called the laws of honor, to maintain his grade in society, it is as capricious as unjust to anathematize those who submit to its decrees. Let the press, let your schools, let the pulpit, let your legislatures, throughout the nation, make a simultaneous effort, and continue it with zeal and perseverance, to extirpate this practice, the undisputed progeny of a barbarous age. Upon such an undertaking, let us hope for the blessing of Heaven.

After other gentlemen had spoken—

Mr. MORRILL made the following remarks:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I learn with pleasure, from what honorable gentlemen have advanced on this subject, there is but one sentiment with respect to the nature and atrocity of the act. A difference of opinion as to the expediency and policy of the measure proposed, is the only difficulty to be encountered.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky intimates a want of information, and an apprehension that no guilt can be attached to any implicated in this affair. It is very desirable, sir, that this should be the fact. If no guilt, no blame; and of course no injury can be sustained by the innocent; and no evil is to be apprehended.

But, the gentleman suggests, that favorable expressions have fallen from gentlemen on the floor of the other House. Is this a fact, sir? it is the more to be lamented, and furnishes another reason why this House should express an opinion on the subject. But, sir, the honorable gentleman from Virginia, with whose eloquence I am generally captivated, and by whose arguments I am commonly drawn into his mode of thinking, has expressed the generous feeling of his heart, on the nature of the act, in a manner in perfect coincidence with my views of the subject. The spontaneous effusions of his heart, thus exhibited, I can by no means doubt, and can hardly suppose the social intercourse which he has holden in this House with the unfortunate sufferer should not have created a more than ordinary attachment. But, sir, the honorable gentleman intimates several reasons why this resolution should not be adopted. It is assuming the exercise of a power vested in another department. Your articles of war do not reach the case. They provide for the punishment of those who give or accept a challenge, but not those who are accessory thereto. As to the civil authority, sir, crimes of this kind, in this region, have passed too long unobserved to justify the most remote expectation that cognizance will be taken of this transaction. But, says the gentleman, it may consign to infamy individuals. If guilty, be it so; to this I have no objection. Would to God that all who are guilty of duelling might, by public disapprobation, be consigned to infamy as lasting as time itself. This would be the most successful and sure way to suppress the practice. The honorable gentleman intimates, the public opinion is incorrect, and this is the best corrective; and it is hard to criminate a person for committing a crime when public opinion requires him so to do to maintain his grade in society. Admit, sir, the public opinion is the best corrective, and that public opinion is incorrect—I would ask that honorable gentleman, what is the best method to correct public opinion? Will resolutions passed in private circles effect the object? Would not the opinion of the President have more influence upon society than that of an obscure individual? Would the gentleman, to purify a stream, cast his corrective into the ocean where it empties, or into the fountain where it originated? I presume, into the fountain. And, sir, upon the same principle, if the public opinion is corrupt, let the correction commence here—in the Senate of the United States. Let the stream be purified. Here, I wish to record my vote against an act so inhuman and wicked. A crime which I detest with all the powers of my soul. But, sir, as my desire is to accommodate the feelings of gentlemen, I will withdraw the resolution and submit a substitute.

Mr. M. then offered the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress, for their consideration, applications which have been received from the Minister Resident of Prussia, and from the Senators of the Free and Hanseatic cities of Hamburg and Bremen, the object of which is, that the advantages secured by the act of Congress of 20th April last, to the vessels and merchandise of the Netherlands, should be extended to those of Prussia, Hamburg, and Bremen. It will appear from these documents, that the vessels of the United States, and the merchandise laden in them, are, in the ports of those Governments, respectively entitled to the same advantages, in respect to imports and duties, as those of the native subjects of the countries themselves. The principle of reciprocity appears to entitle them to the return of the same favor, on the part of the United States, and I recommend it to Congress, that provision to that effect may be made.

JAMES MONROE.

FEBRUARY 11, 1819.

The Message together with the accompanying documents, were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

COMMITTEE ON THE SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following motion: Resolved, That a member be added to the committee already appointed on the subject of the Seminole war, in the place of the honorable Mr. FORSYTH, who has recently been appointed to a foreign mission.

After considerable debate, Mr. EATON moved to postpone the motion to the 5th day of March next, [to defeat it,] on the ground that it would be an unnecessary consumption of the time of the Senate, if not a deviation from the line of its duty, to enter at this late period of the session into an investigation and debate on this subject, which, after a debate of unexampled length, had been solemnly decided on in the House of Representatives. To this it was replied, that nothing more was proposed, in this instance, than was on other occasions considered as matter of course. When an inquiry into the conduct of a public officer or officers, was asked from a respectable source, it was invariably granted; and it would be, it was said, no more than consistent with self-respect, to prosecute to some result the inquiry already commenced in this case. This motion to postpone was negatived, by yeas and nays, 21 to 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crittenden, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Fromentin, Johnson, King, Leake, Morrow, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Daggett, Eppes, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Lacock, Macon, Mellen, Noble, Palmer, Roberts, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

The motion of Mr. LACOCK to fill up the committee was opposed, and of Mr. EATON to postpone the proceedings, was supported by Messrs. OTIS, EATON, and FROMENTIN; on the other side were Messrs. LACOCK, EPPES, BURRILL, TALBOT, GOLDSBOROUGH, and MACON. It was contended by the former, that, without deciding upon the right of the Senate, abstractly, to institute inquiries into the conduct of public officers, or to exercise a censorial power in other cases than those of impeachment, it was sufficient to show that, in this instance, such an interference would be entirely inexpedient. For, that the conduct of the commanding officer in the Seminole war had been at least excused by the President of the United States, and that, so far as that general officer was censured, there was no difference between previous orders and a subsequent excuse or justification. In either case, the mantle of his superior officer was a screen for him; and, if the Executive government had thus assumed the responsibility without sufficient motives and reasons, persons other than General Jackson might be held to answer before the Senate in another capacity, and that this body might thus be placed in a situation of embarrassment, unfavorable to a just and impartial discharge of judicial duties. That if this were true in ordinary cases, it was most emphatically so in the present instance. The House of Representatives was the great inquest and Constitutional accuser of the nation. And, after a most laborious investigation and debate, had decided in favor of a not pros. It would seem then to betray a great eagerness to exercise the faculty of censure and condemnation, to pursue a supposed delinquent after that House had rejected a bill of indictment. The Senate would be placed in an unfavorable and undignified attitude—be chargeable with a spirit of persecution, and would separate themselves, not only from the House of Representatives, but from the people, and excite, in favor of the principal party, feelings of sympathy that would defeat the object of exhibiting the triumph of the civil over the military power. Many remarks were also added to show that to refuse to fill up the committee, or to postpone generally, or to discharge the committee, were equivalent motions, and all in perfect conformity with correct and dignified proceedings.

On the other hand, the filling up the committee was supported and the postponement resisted, upon the suggestion that the committee, after making progress in their inquiries, and after much laborious research, and after a majority of them were agreed on many points, were divided upon others, and that the Senate was bound by the respect due to itself to fill up the vacancy and not stifle the report; and that afterwards, upon a motion to discharge the committee, if it should be offered, conclusive reasons should be shown against that measure. To decline replacing a member, whose sentiments were known to be unfavorable to the proceedings in the Seminole war, and who had received an Executive appointment, would be to expose the motives of the Executive to misconstruction. That the Senate possessed a concurrent right with the House of Representatives to originate any investigation into the proceedings of public officers, or the conduct of public affairs, and was bound as an independent branch of the Legislature to discharge its duty, without any reference to the proceedings of the House, to which all allusions were unparliamentary and improper. It was denied to be the correct doctrine that a military officer is in all cases protected by the command or justification of his superior; and, if it were true, it might be better to disband the Army. That the present moment was favorable to sustaining and defining the rights of the Senate. And, finally, that it would not follow of course that the present proceedings would involve a question of censure or approbation of any officer; but the committee might possess evidence (and it was suggested that they did) of irregularities not exhibited to the House, which might demand legislative interposition and reform.

The motion of Mr. LACOCK, was then agreed to, and Mr. EPPES was appointed the member.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making further provision for the sale of public lands; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

And to insert in lieu thereof, the following:

"That credit shall not be allowed for the purchase money on the sale of any of the public lands which shall be sold after the — day of — next, at any land office which shall have been open for the sale of lands five years previous to said day; nor at any other land office now established, at any time after five years from the time it was first opened for the sale of public lands; but every purchaser of land, after the periods above specified, shall, on the day of purchase, make complete payment therefor; and the purchaser at private sale, after the said periods respectively, shall produce to the register of the land office a receipt from the Treasurer of the United States, or from the receiver of public moneys of the district, for the amount of purchase money on any tract, before he shall enter the same at the land office; and if any person, being the highest bidder at the said public sales for a tract of land, shall fail to make payment therefor, on the day on which the same was purchased, the tract shall be again offered at public sale, and such person shall not be capable of becoming the purchaser of that or any other tract offered at such public sale."

This question was decided in the negative by yeas and nays, 32 to 1—as follows:

YEAS—Mr. Edwards.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Eaton, Eppes, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

Mr. EDWARDS then moved to strike out of the 3d section (which prescribes the terms to purchasers at private sale) the words "at one dollar and fifty cents an acre, to be paid at the time of making such entry as aforesaid;" and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

"Upon the following terms, viz: to the purchaser of not more than eighty acres, at fifty cents an acre; to the purchaser of not more than one quarter section, at seventy-five cents an acre; to the purchaser of not more than one section, at one dollar an acre; and to purchasers of any amount exceeding one section, at — an acre: Provided, however, That no tract less than one section, purchased as aforesaid, shall be transferable in any manner whatever at any time within five years from the time of the purchase thereof."

This motion was determined in the negative—yeas 2, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Edwards, and Thomas.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Eaton, Eppes, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

The fourth section of the bill being taken up, Mr. EDWARDS moved to strike therefrom the following clause:

"That the public lands heretofore sold, or which shall have been sold prior to the — day of — next, on terms of credit for part of the purchase money, and which have, or shall hereafter become forfeited, or revert in any manner to the United States, for failure to make payment, shall not be subject to entry at private sale, after the — day of — next, aforesaid: but all the lands which at that day shall have been forfeited or reverted to the United States, as aforesaid, in any of the districts established for the sale of the public lands, shall be offered at public sale, to the highest bidder, at the land office for such respective district, under the superintendence of the register and receiver of public money for such district, in half-quarter sections, on the terms of a cash payment of the purchase money, on such day or days, in the respective districts, as the President of the United States shall, by proclamation, designate for that purpose; and all the heretofore reserved sections, for the future disposal of Congress, which shall remain unsold on the said — day of — next, shall be offered at public sale, at the same time and manner, and on the same terms with the lands which had reverted, and which are hereby directed to be sold; and any lands which shall have been sold prior to the — day of — next, and which shall thereafter revert, or become forfeited to the United States, for failure in making payment, shall not be subject to entry at private sale, until such lands shall have been first offered at public sale, in the manner and on the terms provided with respect to lands which shall revert, or become forfeited, before that day. The public sales for which shall take place at such time as shall be designated for the purpose, by the proclamation of the President of the United States."

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

"That where any person shall be actually settled on any quarter section of land which shall have been previously offered at public sale, and remain unsold, such person shall, upon application to the register of the land office in the district in which the land may lie, be entitled, upon satisfactory proof thereof, to receive from said register a license to remain on the said land for the term of five years; during which time, provided the said settler shall continue to reside thereon, the said land shall not be liable to be sold to any other person; but if the said settler shall, at any time within the said five years, and during his actual residence on said land, tender payment for the same, at the rate of — an acre, with legal interest thereon, from the date of his license, and shall actually pay the same to the receiver, and produce his receipt as in other cases, the land shall be sold to the said settler, upon his making oath, before the register, that he has not purchased any other tract of land subsequent to the date of this license."

This motion was also decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Edwards, Fromentin, Johnson, and Thomas.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Eaton, Eppes, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee and Wilson.

Mr. EDWARDS next moved to add to the third section the following proviso:

"Provided, however, That no person shall be permitted to purchase, either directly or indirectly, at any land office, more than one section of land in any one year, and all purchases made contrary to this provision shall be utterly null and void."

The question being taken on this motion, it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Edwards, Fromentin, Macon, Morrill, Ruggles, Thomas, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Eaton, Eppes, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Lacock, Leake, Mellen, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Roberts, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

Mr. EDWARDS then proposed to strike out of the third section, fixing the minimum price at which public lands shall be offered at public sale, at one dollar and fifty cents, per acre, the words "and fifty cents," so as to reduce the price to one dollar.

This motion was negatived—yeas 11, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crittenden, Edwards, Fromentin, Johnson, Leake, Noble, Ruggles, Taylor, Thomas, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Daggett, Dickerson, Eaton, Eppes, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, King, Macon, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Otis, Palmer, Roberts, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Mississippi.

The bill having been amended, it was reported to the House, and the amendments being concurred in—

Mr. EDWARDS moved so to amend the third section as to fix the price at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, instead of one dollar and fifty cents.

This motion was also negatived—yeas 9, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crittenden, Edwards, Johnson, Leake, Ruggles, Taylor, Thomas, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Daggett, Dickerson, Eaton, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lacock, Macon, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Roberts, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Mississippi.

Mr. NOBLE then proposed in effect to reject the bill, by moving to postpone it to the fifth day of March.

This motion was determined in the negative—yeas 6, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Edwards, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Talbot, and Thomas.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Daggett, Dickerson, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Mellen, Morrill, Morrow, Otis, Roberts, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

Mr. EDWARDS moved to fill the blanks in the bill so as to put the act into operation on the 1st of October, 1820, which motion was lost—yeas 12, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Edwards, Lacock, Mellen, Noble, Ruggles, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Daggett, Dickerson, Eaton, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Macon, Morrill, Morrow, Otis, Palmer, Roberts, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

The blanks having been filled with the "first day of July, 1820," the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

[For the following remarks, made by Mr. CRITTENDEN, in conclusion of a speech in support of the bill, we are obliged to a friend who was present at the debate, for being enabled to lay before our readers.—Editors.]

Mr. President, I must acknowledge to you that I feel a peculiar sort of partiality for this bill; and that, independent of the reasons which I have had the honor of submitting, I am influenced by feelings somewhat of a personal character to desire its passage. It is the work of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. MORROW,) who is so soon to be finally separated from us. He has long been our Palinurus in everything that related to this important subject. He has steered us safely through all its difficulties, and, with him for our helmsman, we have feared neither Scylla nor Charybdis. We have heretofore followed him with increasing confidence. We have never been deceived or disappointed. The bill now before you is probably the last, the most important, act of his long and useful political life. If it shall pass, sir, it will identify his name and his memory with this interesting subject. It will be his "perennius are." A noble monument! which, whilst it guides the course of future legislation, shall perpetuate the remembrance of an honest man. Sir, if the ostracism of former times prevailed with us, I do not know the individual whose virtues would more expose him to its envious and jealous sentence. The illustrious Greek himself, who derived such unfortunate distinction from that ancient usage, did not better deserve the epithet of "just." Mr. President, I do not intend to flatter the honorable gentleman from Ohio. Flattery is falsehood. I burn no such incense at the shrine of any man. The sincere homage of the heart is not flattery. I have spoken the spontaneous feelings of my own breast. I am confident, too, that I have spoken the sentiments of the Senate. But yet, sir, I ought, perhaps, to beg pardon of the honorable gentleman. For, I have much cause to fear that the gratification I have had in offering this poor tribute of my respect, is more than counterbalanced by the pain it has inflicted on him.

FRIDAY, February 19.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of a number of the citizens of the State of Maryland, on the subject of the deranged state of the circulating medium of the country, and the expediency of additional duties on cotton goods imported into the United States; and the memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. LEAKE presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, praying the establishment of a port of entry at or near the mouth of Pearl river; and the memorial was read.

Mr. LEAKE also presented the memorial of the said Legislature, on the subject of British claims to lands in Hancock and Jackson counties in said State; and the memorial was read.

Mr. NOBLE presented the petition of Samuel Sterrett, praying payment for his services as a mounted ranger; and the petition was read and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Biggar's company, made a report accompanied by a resolution that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition. The report and resolution were read.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Wheaton," reported the same without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the benefit of Jacob Purkhill; and no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill to continue in force, for a further term, the act entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, and for other purposes," was read the second time.

The bill making further provision for the sale of public lands was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to designate the boundaries of districts and establish land offices for the disposal of the public lands not heretofore offered for sale in the States of Ohio and Indiana, was read a third time and passed.

Forsyth, widow of the late Lieutenant Colonel Benjamin Forsyth, made a report, accompanied by a resolution that the petitioner have leave to withdraw her petition. The report and resolution were read.

Mr. MORROW, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Indian tribes, reported the following bill, which was read and passed to the second reading:

A bill making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements.

Be it enacted &c., That, for the purpose of providing against the further decline and final extinction of the Indian tribes adjoining to the frontier settlements of the United States, and for introducing among them the habits and arts of civilization, the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized in every case where he shall judge the improvement in the habits and conditions of such Indians practicable, and that the means of instruction can be introduced with their own consent, to employ capable persons, of good moral character, to instruct them in the mode of agriculture suited to their situation, and for teaching their children in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and for performing such other duties as may be enjoined according to such instructions and rules as the President may give and prescribe for the regulation of their conduct in the discharge of their duties.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the annual sum of — dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act; and an account of the expenditure of the money, and proceedings in execution of the foregoing provisions, shall be annually laid before Congress.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. WILSON, from the Joint Committee on the subject of the Public Printing, made the following report:

That, regarding the subject committed to them as connected with the convenience of the members, the information of the community, the economy of time and money, and the character of the country, they have given it all the consideration which their other engagements permitted.

That three different modes of procuring the printing of Congress to be executed have undergone their discussion and deliberation:

I. Offering the work by advertisement (as at present) to the lowest bidder.

On this mode the committee would remark that, although at the first glance it may strike the mind as the most economical, experience and observation do not prove it so. Competitors for the work underbid each other, until it is undertaken for a less sum than it can be afforded at; and too small an establishment and too few workmen are consequently employed to execute the printing with the necessary promptitude. Hence both Houses have frequently to wait long for interesting and important communications from the President or heads of Departments, reports, bills, resolutions, &c., upon which they are called to act; and the loss of time thus incurred, considering the daily expense at which Congress sits, costs the nation much more than the difference between the present price and a liberal allowance, which would justify the application of a greater capital to insure the despatch of the work.

Another disadvantage attending the present mode is, that the reduced price of the work prevents that care and attention from being bestowed on it which is necessary to its neatness and accuracy. And documents are not only distributed through this nation, but dispersed through Europe, which are executed in such an inelegant and incorrect manner as must bring disgrace and ridicule on the literature and the press of our country.

That the present price of printing is too low would be readily discovered by any of the profession; and the fact that no other printer in the District could be found by the Secretary or the Clerk who would execute the work at the contract prices must satisfy the mind of every gentleman of the truth of what the committee have asserted. How far it is reputable for Congress to endeavor to get their work done below a fair and reasonable price, may be a matter of doubt; but it does not admit of a question that the compensation ought to be adequate to the object of procuring that work to be done at a proper time, and in a suitable manner.

II. A second mode suggested to and considered by the committee was the establishment of a national printing office, (with a bindery and stationery annexed,) which should execute the work of Congress while in session, and that of the various Departments of Government during the recess; and should do all the binding and furnish all the stationery for the Departments as well as for Congress. To ascertain the amount of expenditures on these objects, inquiries were addressed by the committee to the heads of Departments, Attorney General, and Postmaster General, and an answer received from each. Some of the reports were made in such a manner as not to enable the committee to separate the accounts for printing from those for binding and stationery; but the whole amount exceeds $41,000. Add to this the expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives on the same objects, viz: the former $8,000 and the latter $15,000, and the aggregate cost of the public printing, binding, and stationery, is about $65,000 a year, of which probably one-half is for printing. And this, it will be remembered, does not include the great variety and number of blanks executed elsewhere than at the seat of Government, from copies furnished by the Departments of the Treasury, War, &c., and which might all be done here at a much less expense were a national printing office established.

The committee are of opinion that such an establishment, under the superintendence of a man of activity, integrity, and discretion, would be likely to produce promptitude, uniformity, accuracy, and elegance, in the execution of the public printing; and they are not certain that it would not, in the result, connecting with it a bindery and stationery, as already suggested, be found the most economical. But, as the principle is somewhat novel, and the details would require some deliberation, the committee have not deemed it advisable, at this late period of the session, and amidst the pressure which both Houses experience from the accumulation of business important to the nation, or interesting to individuals, to submit a proposition on which there would probably be a considerable diversity of opinion and consumption of time.

III. Under all circumstances, the committee have deemed it their duty to recommend that a tariff of prices for every kind of printing required to be done for Congress be fixed by a joint resolution of the two Houses, to continue in force for two years; and that, before the close of the present session, each House make choice by ballot of a printer, to execute its own work during the next Congress. The prices should be adequate to the employment of sufficient capital and workmen to perform the work expeditiously, and to insure such care and attention as shall give it such a degree of accuracy and elegance as shall not dishonor the literature and typography of the country.

With former contracts before us, and with the professional knowledge which may be called in aid, no difficulty would occur in forming the tariff alluded to on principles at once liberal to the printer and advantageous to Congress; and, in the selection of its printer, each House would doubtless take especial care to choose a man of capacity, probity, and responsibility. In addition to the bond and security to be required of them for the faithful performance of their obligations, a provision might be added, that, in case of any unreasonable delay, another person might be employed to do the work, at such a price as the Secretary or the Clerk might be able to get it done for, and that the public printers should, respectively, be responsible for any difference between the sum allowed them and that which it might be necessary to give him.

The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the joint committee on public printing be instructed to report a resolution for carrying the foregoing propositions into effect.

The report and resolution were read.

BRITISH COLONIAL TRADE.

In Executive session—

Mr. MACOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the documents accompanying the Commercial Convention with Great Britain, as relates to the colonial trade, made the following report, which was read:

That the object of the negotiation with Great Britain, respecting the colonial trade, is the establishment of a regulation whereby a trade in articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States, and of the British colonies, may be carried on between them; and secondly, a regulation whereby the shipping of the two countries may be placed on an equal footing in the carrying on of this trade.

In respect to the articles of the trade, the United States would agree that all articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States, and of the respective colonies, should be included, and all other articles excluded. But as Great Britain probably would not consent to this arrangement, the United States would not object to the catalogue of articles of the produce and manufactures of the United States, and of the said colonies, enumerated in the British act of Parliament, and according to which the trade has heretofore been carried on in British bottoms.

As respects duties and charges, they should be placed on a footing of reciprocal equality: if Great Britain would consent to impose no higher or other duties on articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States imported into the colonies, than upon the like articles imported from her continental colonies, (whence only they can be obtained,) the United States might agree to impose no greater or other duties and charges on articles the produce and manufacture of her colonies, than on the like articles from other countries. To this adjustment Great Britain will probably disagree: in lieu thereof, and as a compensation for the stipulation not to impose greater or other duties on the colonial articles of Great Britain, than on the like articles of other countries, it might be stipulated, on the part of Great Britain, that the duties and charges on articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States, should not exceed by more than — per cent. those which should be imposed on the like articles imported from the British continental colonies.

In no event should articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States pay higher duties and charges in the direct voyage from the United States than in the indirect or circuitous voyage through New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Bermudas, or other intermediate ports; and as the direct trade should not be more restrained in respect to the articles thereof, than the indirect or circuitous trade, no article should be allowed to go or come indirectly or circuitously, which might not go or come directly.

There is nothing in principle or policy, that forbids the confining of this trade to articles of the produce or manufacture of the respective countries; that is, of the United States and of the British colonies: articles of produce and manufacture of other portions of the British territories coming through these colonies being excluded from the United States, as articles not of the produce and manufacture of the United States are excluded from Great Britain, and would be excluded from the British colonies.

As respects the shipping employed in this trade, it must be placed on a footing of practical and reciprocal equality, both as respects duties and charges, and the equal participation of the trade; on this adjustment, even, there will exist an advantage in favor of the English navigation; as it will be exclusively employed in the transportation of articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States, between the intermediate colonies aforesaid and the West Indian colonies, and likewise in a disproportioned degree, in the distribution of these articles among the British West India colonies.

Furthermore, as the voyage from the United States to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Bermuda, is a short one, and would yield but little profit, the duties and charges must be as great on the British ships, and the articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States composing their cargoes, arriving in the British West India colonies, through these intermediate colonies, as on the same ships and articles arriving directly from the United States; otherwise the direct trade will be deserted in favor of the circuitous trade, and thereby the object of the arrangement, an equality in the employment of the shipping of the two countries, will be defeated. So far as the operation of the late navigation law is understood, it seems to have been advantageous, and especially in the increase of the American shipping engaged in the direct trade between the United States and Great Britain, and the corresponding decrease of that of Great Britain—but sufficient time has not yet been afforded satisfactorily to ascertain this point, or to determine other questions that are in a course of solution.

Perhaps it would be prudent to allow time for this important experiment, and to suffer the negotiation on this subject to remain where it is for the present. It ought not to be forgotten, that without cutting off the trade with New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Bermuda, this experiment cannot be fairly made. Whether it would be expedient at the present session to adopt this measure, is perhaps doubtful.

If the effect of our navigation law, reinforced according to the above suggestion, should prove to be such as it not improbably will be, it might, and probably would be our true footing to adhere to the law, and decline any convention with Great Britain, touching the colonial trade.

REPORT ON THE SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. LACOCK, from the committee appointed in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate of the 18th December last, "That the Message of the President and documents, relative to the Seminole war, be referred to a select committee, who shall have authority, if necessary, to send for persons and papers; that said committee inquire relative to the advance of the United States troops into West Florida; whether the officers in command at Pensacola and St. Marks were amenable to, and under the control of, Spain; and, particularly, what circumstances existed, to authorize or justify the Commanding General in taking possession of those posts," reported:

That they have, under the authority conferred on them, called for and examined persons and papers. The testimony obtained is herewith submitted. The committee, after the most mature and dispassionate examination of the subject, offer for the consideration of the Senate the following narrative of facts, and the opinions and deductions clearly arising from, and growing out of, the facts thus presented. On the origin of the hostilities between the United States and the Seminole Indians, the committee ask leave to remark, that the different savage tribes living within and on the borders of the Floridas, denominated Seminole Indians, were principally fugitives from the more northern tribes, resident within the limits of the United States. After the Treaty of 1814, with the Creek Indians, a considerable addition was made to the number of those fugitives, as the Indians who were dissatisfied with the provisions of that treaty took refuge in the Floridas; cherishing, there can be little doubt, feelings of hostility to the United States. These feelings seem to have been strengthened by the influence of foreign emissaries, who had taken up their residence among them; among whom, as the most conspicuous, were Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister. In this state of things, it appears that the Executive Department of the Government deemed it necessary, for the security of the frontier, to establish a line of forts near the southern boundary of the United States, and to occupy those fortifications with portions of the regular forces, and by these means peace was maintained with the Indians until the Spring or Summer of 1817, when the regular forces were withdrawn from the posts on the Georgia frontier, and concentrated at Fort Montgomery, on the Alabama river, a considerable distance west of the Georgia line. But it seems that about this time a border warfare was commenced between the Seminole Indians and the frontier inhabitants of Georgia. It is difficult to determine with certainty who commenced those hostilities, or on whom the greatest injuries were inflicted. General Gaines, however, demanded a surrender of the Indians who had committed outrages on the frontiers of Georgia. With this demand they refused to comply, alleging that the first and greatest aggressions had been made by the white men. In consequence of this refusal, General Gaines was authorized by the Secretary of War, at his discretion, to remove the Indians still remaining on the lands ceded to the United States by the treaty made with the Creeks in 1814; in so doing he is told that it might be proper to retain some of them as hostages, until reparation was made for the depredations committed by the Indians. In pursuance of this discretionary authority, General Gaines ordered a detachment of near three hundred men, under the command of Major Twiggs, to surround and take an Indian village, called Fowl Town, about fourteen miles from Fort Scott, and near the Florida line. This detachment arrived at Fowl Town in the night, and the Indians, taking the alarm, and flying to an adjacent swamp, were fired on by the detachment, and one man and one woman killed. Two Indians were made prisoners. The detachment returned to Fort Scott. A day or two afterwards, as stated by Captain McIntosh, who was of the party, about the same number of troops paid a second visit to the same village, as he states, for the purpose of obtaining property. While loading their wagons with corn, and collecting horses and cattle, they were fired upon by the Indians, and a skirmish ensued, in which a small loss was sustained on both sides. It is stated by Captain Young, the topographical engineer, that this town contained about 45 Indian warriors, besides women and children.

A few days after the affair of Fowl Town, Lieutenant Scott, with a detachment of forty men, seven women, and some children, ascending the Appalachicola, with clothing and supplies for the garrison of Fort Scott, when within a few miles of that place was attacked by a party of Indians; himself and his whole party fell victims to their fury, except six men, who made their escape, and one woman made prisoner.

From this time the war became more serious; the Indians, in considerable numbers, were embodied, and an open attack was made on Fort Scott. General Gaines, with about 600 regular soldiers, was confined to the garrison. In this state of things, information having been communicated to the War Department, General Jackson was ordered to take the field; he was advised of the regular and militia force, amounting to 1,800 men, provided for that service, and the estimated force by General Gaines, of the enemy, said to be 2,800 strong; and directed, if he should consider the force provided insufficient to beat the enemy, to call on the Governors of the adjoining States for such portions of the militia as he might think requisite. On the receipt of this order General Jackson, instead of observing the orders of the Department of War, by calling on the Governor of Tennessee, then in Nashville, near the place of his residence, chose to appeal (to use his own expressions) to the patriotism of the West Tennesseans, who had served under him in the last war. 1,000 mounted gun-men, and two companies of what were called life-guards, with the utmost alacrity, volunteered their services, from the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, and repaired to his standard. Officers were appointed to command this corps by the General himself, or by other persons acting under his authority. Thus organized, they were mustered into the service of the United States.

About the time General Jackson was organizing this detachment of volunteers in the State of Tennessee, or perhaps previously thereto, General Gaines was likewise employed in raising forces among the Creek Indians. There was this difference in the two cases: General Jackson raised his army in disregard of positive orders; General Gaines, without orders, took upon himself the authority of raising an army of at least 1,600 Creek Indians, appointing their officers, with a Brigadier General at their head, and likewise mustering this force into the service of the United States.

While your committee feel a pleasure in applauding the zeal and promptitude that have marked the military conduct of these general officers on many former occasions, they would feel themselves wanting in their duty to the Senate and the nation if they did not express their decided disapprobation of the conduct of the commanding generals, in the steps they took to raise and organize the force employed on this occasion. There was no law in existence that authorized even the President of the United States to raise or accept the services of volunteers. The law passed for that purpose had expired in the year 1815. The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress, exclusively, the power of raising armies, and to the President and Senate the power of appointing the officers to command those armies when raised. The Constitution, likewise, gives Congress power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union—to suppress insurrections, and to repel invasions—but reserves to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers. In conformity with the last recited provision of the Constitution, the Congress of the United States have passed laws authorizing the President, when the contingencies above alluded to should happen, to call on the governors, or any militia officers, of the respective States, for such portion of the militia as he might deem requisite for the occasion; and, in strict observance of these laws, was General Jackson ordered to call on the Governors of the States adjacent to the seat of war, for the requisite militia force.

It is with regret that the committee are compelled to declare, that they conceive General Jackson to have disregarded the positive orders of the Department of War, the Constitution, and laws; that he has taken upon himself not only the exercise of those powers delegated to Congress, as the sole legislative authority of the nation, and to the President and Senate, as it relates to the appointments, but of the power which had been expressly reserved to the States, in the appointment of the officers of the militia; a power the more valuable to the States because, as they had surrendered to the General Government the revenues and physical force of the nation, they could only look to the officers of the militia as a security against the possible abuse of the delegated power. The committee find the melancholy fact before them, that military officers, even at this early stage of this Republic, have, without the shadow of authority, raised an army of at least two thousand five hundred men, and mustered them into the service of the United States. Two hundred and thirty officers have been appointed, and their rank established, from an Indian brigadier general down to the lowest subaltern of a company. To whom were these officers accountable for their conduct? Not to the President of the United States, for it will be found that it was not considered necessary even to furnish him with a list of their names; and not until the pay-rolls were made out, and payment demanded, were the persons known to the Department of War. And in this place it is proper to observe, that General Jackson seemed to consider those officers of his own creation, competent to discharge all the functions of officers appointed by the authority of the General or State Governments, for we find five of them detailed afterwards to set on a general court martial, on a trial of life and death. Might not, on the same principles, General Jackson have tried, condemned, and executed any officer of the Georgia militia, by the sentence of a court martial, composed of officers created by him, and holding their assumed authority by the tenor of his will?

Your committee will dismiss this branch of the subject by observing that, consistently with the character and genius of our Government, no officer, however high or exalted his station, can be justified for an infraction of the Constitution; it is an offence against the sovereignty of the nation, this sovereignty being vested in the great body of the people. The Constitution is the written expression of their will, and above the control of all the public functionaries combined. And when that instrument has been violated, the people alone have power to grant the indemnity for its infraction; and all that can be said in favor of the officer who transgresses his constitutional powers, must be taken not in justification of the act, but in mitigation of the enormity of the offence committed. With this view of the subject, which they conceive to be a correct one, the committee have in vain sought for an excuse for the commanding general. He has stated in his letter to the Secretary of War, assuming the power to judge for the National Legislature, that a volunteer force of mounted gun men would be the least expensive and the most efficient. His duty was to execute the orders of his superior officers, not to disobey them; to observe and enforce the laws, not violate them. Obedience and subordination are the first and highest duties of a soldier, and no one knew better the truth of, and the necessity for, observing this maxim, than the officer in question. For the truth of this observation, we have his own declaration. In his letter to the Secretary of War, of 20th January, 1818, he says, "your letter, enclosing your general order of the 29th ultimo, has been received; like yourself, I have no other feelings to gratify than those connected with the public good, and it gives me pleasure to find we coincide in those opinions calculated to produce it. Responsibility now rests where it should—on the officer issuing the order—and the principle acknowledged is calculated to insure that subordination so necessary to the harmonious movement of every part of the military machine."

It is to be regretted, that an officer who seemed to be so perfectly acquainted with what belonged to the duty of others, should have been so totally regardless or unconscious of his own; and while the committee are willing to admit that the volunteer forces called into service by General Jackson were more efficient and less expensive than the militia, had he confined himself to the usual proportion of officers, this, they conceive, should not be urged as an argument in favor of employing them, or plead in justification of the unlawful act; for if these reasons be considered conclusive, and should be acquiesced in, they will be applied with increased force (fortified by this precedent) in all future wars; an army of regulars will be considered (as they really are) more efficient and less expensive than either the volunteers, if authorized by law, or the militia; and the officer at the head of such army (acting on the principles before stated, and encouraged by the acquiescence of the nation) may dispense with the militia altogether, and increase the regular army to any extent that folly or ambition may suggest; and all this under the plea of necessity. The committee can scarcely imagine a possible case that may occur in a future war, where the necessity will be less strong than in the present. This war was waged when the United States were at peace with all the world, except this miserable undisciplined banditti of "deluded Indians" and fugitive slaves; their whole strength, when combined, not exceeding one thousand men; opposed to whom, (previous to General Jackson's taking the command,) and under General Gaines, were a force of one thousand eight hundred regulars and militia, besides the one thousand five hundred friendly Indians, illegally subsidized by the last mentioned general. What, then, in this state of the case, becomes of the plea of necessity? And if it be admitted in this case, to justify or palliate an act of military usurpation, the committee would anxiously inquire where it is to be disallowed or denied? And here the committee, having pledged themselves faithfully to disclose facts, and impartially to draw conclusions, beg leave to remark, that the conduct of the commanding general, in raising this volunteer corps, was approbated by the War Department, as will appear by the letter of the Secretary, dated the 29th day of January, 1818; and it is but justice to the Department to state, that it was not until the officers that had assisted in thus officering and organizing this corps, were examined by the committee, that they were apprized of the illegality of the measure; for there is nothing to be found in General Jackson's letters on this subject, to the Secretary of War, of the 12th, 13th, and 20th of February, 1818, from which it can be fairly inferred that he had appointed a single officer. Indeed, it would seem, from a fair interpretation of those letters, that the officers, at least, were of the regular militia of the States, and that the only departure from his orders by the general, was his having called on the subordinate officers of the militia, instead of the Governor of the State of Tennessee, and his preference of mounted men to infantry. And it will also appear, from the letters aforesaid, that had the Department of War disapproved of this conduct, and determined to countermand the order of General Jackson in raising this force, no order to that effect could have reached him before he had arrived at the seat of war, and of course the army might have been disbanded in sight of the enemy, and the objects of the campaign thereby jeopardized, and perhaps defeated.

The committee will next take notice of the operations of the army in the Floridas, whither they were authorized to pursue the enemy; and, connected with this authority, it was enjoined on General Gaines, to whom the first order to this effect was given, that in case the enemy took refuge under a Spanish garrison, not to attack them there, but to report the fact to the Secretary of War; and the observance of this order, the committee conceive, was equally obligatory on General Jackson, who succeeded to the command—at least, it must have clearly evinced the will of the Secretary of War on that point, and how far this injunction was observed, will be found by what followed. It appears that General Jackson advanced into Florida with a force of 1,800 men, composed of regulars, volunteers, and the Georgia militia, and afterwards, on the first day of April, was joined by General McIntosh, and his brigade of 1,500 Indians, who had been previously organized by General Gaines; opposed to whom it appears, from the report of Captain Young, topographical engineer, and other evidence, the whole forces of the fugitive Seminole Indians and runaway negroes, had they all been embodied, could not have exceeded nine hundred or one thousand men; and at no time did half that number present themselves to oppose his march—of course little or no resistance was made.

The Micasuky towns were first taken and destroyed. The army marched upon St. Marks, a feeble Spanish garrison, which was surrendered "without firing a gun," and then occupied as an American post; the Spanish commandant having first, by humble entreaties, and then by a timid protest, endeavored to avert the measure. Here Alexander Arbuthnot was found, taken prisoner, and put in confinement, for the purpose, as it was stated by General Jackson, "of collecting evidence to establish his guilt;" and here, also, were taken two Indian chiefs, one of whom pretended to possess the spirit of prophecy; they were hung without trial, and with little ceremony.

This being done, and St. Marks garrisoned by American troops, the army pursued their march eastward to Suwaney river, on which they found a large Indian village, which was consumed, and the Indians and negroes were dispersed; after which the army returned to St. Marks, bringing with them Robert C. Ambrister, who had been taken prisoner on their march to Suwaney. During the halt of the army for a few days at St. Marks, a general court martial was called; Arbuthnot was arraigned; found guilty; sentenced to suffer death, and hung.

Ambrister was tried in like manner, found guilty, and sentenced to whipping and confinement. General Jackson annulled the sentence, and ordered him to be shot: and this order was executed.

It appears, by the testimony, that the army had arrived at St. Marks, on their return from Suwaney, on the 25th of April; and on the 26th General Jackson writes to the Secretary at War in the following manner: "I shall leave this in two or three days, for Fort Gadsden; and, after making all necessary arrangements for the security of the positions occupied and detaching a force to scour the country west of the Appalachicola, I shall proceed direct to Nashville; my presence in this country can be no longer necessary. The Indian forces have been divided and scattered; cut off from all communication with those unprincipled agents of foreign nations, who have deluded them to their ruin, they have not the power, if the will remains, of annoying our frontier." It appears, however, by the conduct of the commanding general, that he had, at this time, looked to different movements; for, at the time he was writing this letter, as will be seen by the testimony of Captain Call and Surgeon Bronaugh, he had despatched Lieutenant Sands to Mobile, to forward on a train of artillery, to a given point, to be ready to be made use of in reducing Pensacola and the fort of

Barrancas, should that measure be thereafter thought proper. Having made these arrangements, the army marched to Fort Gadsden, on the Appalachicola river. There, as stated by General Jackson, and confirmed by the testimony of Colonel Butler, information was received by a private letter, written by a merchant at Pensacola to Mr. Doyle, and shown to General Jackson, that a number of Indians had recently visited Pensacola, and were committing depredations on the Spanish inhabitants of that place, and were receiving aid and comfort from the garrison. On the receipt of this intelligence, the resolution seems to have been taken to garrison that place with American troops; and, after a march of about twenty days, having met his artillery, General Jackson, with about twelve hundred men, the rest having been discharged, appeared before Pensacola, the capital of the province. The place was taken with scarce the show of resistance. The Governor had escaped, and taken refuge in the fort of the Barrancas; to which place, distant about six miles, the army marched, and the fortress was invested on the 25th of May; and a demand being made for its surrender, and refused, the attack was made on the fortress by land and water, and after the bombardment and cannonading had been kept up for a part of two days, and some lives lost, the fortress was surrendered, the garrison made prisoners of war; and the officers of the Government, civil and military, transported to the Havana, agreeably to the terms of the capitulation; which terms General Jackson, in his letter of the 2d of June, 1818, declares, "were more favorable than a conquered enemy would have merited." The civil and military government of Spain thus annulled, General Jackson thought it necessary to abolish the revenue laws of Spain, and establish those of the United States, as more favorable to the commerce of the United States; and, for this purpose, Captain Gadsden was appointed collector, and by him, under the authority of General Jackson, that department of the new government was organized. The Spanish authorities being thus put down by the sword, both civil and military, a new government was established for this newly acquired territory, the powers of which, both civil and military, were vested in military officers. And General Jackson having declared, in numerous communications to the Department of War, that the Seminole war was closed, and the object of the campaign at an end, he returned to his residence at Nashville, State of Tennessee. And here it would have given the committee sincere pleasure to have stated, that the story of the campaign had closed, but facts which it becomes now their duty to report, require that history to be continued. On the 7th of August, 1818, more than two months after his consummation of the conquest of West and part of East Florida, he issued an order to General Gaines, directing him to take possession of St. Augustine, a strong fortress, and the capital of East Florida. A copy of this order is subjoined to this report, and his reasons for this measure are stated at large in the order, and reiterated and enforced by his letter to the Secretary of War, dated the 10th of the same month, which reasons, fully and beyond the possibility of doubt, discover the motives of the commanding general in all his movements against Spain.

The tendency of these measures by the commanding general, seems to have been to involve the nation in a war without her consent, and for reasons of his own, unconnected with his military functions.

Your committee would be unwilling to attribute improper motives, where those of a different character could be possibly inferred, more especially, when it is to affect a character, whose military fame is the pride and boast of the nation; but even such a character becomes more eminently dangerous, when he exalts himself above the majesty of the laws; declares the public will, and becomes the arbiter between the United States and foreign nations. That these high and transcendent powers have been usurped and exercised in the present case, is, it appears to the committee, incontrovertibly evident from the facts adduced.

The Constitution declares, article first, section eight, "Congress shall have power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and to make rules concerning captures on land and water." Surely, it was never designed, by this provision, that a military officer should first make war, and leave it to Congress afterwards to declare it. This would involve an absurdity that it is unnecessary to expose. It is sufficient to say that the Executive authority of the United States, and much less a subordinate officer, has no power to change the pacific relations of the nation. The President of the United States is bound, constitutionally, to preserve the peace of the country until Congress declares it in a state of war; he can only, while thus in a state of peace, use the military forces of the nation in three specified cases, that is: "to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection, and repel invasion." [See Constitution, article first, section eight; also, the act for calling forth the militia, passed 24th February, 1795.] It will not be pretended that Spain had invaded the United States, or that Congress had declared war against that nation; and, of course, the relations of peace did exist between the two countries at the time General Jackson took possession of the Spanish possessions in the Floridas. These facts being admitted, and they cannot be denied, the only question to decide is, whether the military conduct of General Jackson was not war against Spain, and on this subject there can be no room to doubt. The capital of a Spanish province is taken by the sword; a fortress is invested and bombarded; lives are lost, and the place surrendered on capitulation, the terms of which are declared "more favorable than a conquered enemy merited;" military officers and men, as well as those in the civil departments of Government, are transported to the West Indies, and a new Government established for the conquered country. If all these acts of hostility combined do not constitute war, the committee confess themselves utterly at a loss for its definition; or, if the fact be denied, the consequence of such denial will be a proof that no war was made by the Seminole Indians on the United States, and, of course, that the invasion of Florida was an unauthorized act of aggression on the part of the United States. But the committee will pursue this subject a little farther, and examine the reasons offered by the officer commanding for taking possession of and occupying the Spanish fortresses, more especially Pensacola and the Barrancas. Those reasons are to be found in his numerous reports to the War Department, and his letter to the Spanish officers who commanded in the different fortresses, and are these: That Spain had not observed her treaty stipulations with the United States as it related to the Florida Indians, and whose peaceable conduct she was bound to guaranty to the United States; that she had furnished those Indians at war with the United States with arms, ammunition, and supplies necessary to carry on the war. Here the committee would observe that they are neither the advocates nor the apologists of Spain. There can be no doubt but she had, by the violation of her engagements, given sufficient cause of war; but they defend the Constitution by saying that General Jackson had no power to declare nor make the war; that neither he, nor even the President of the United States, had any discretion or power to judge what was or was not cause of war. This the Constitution had wisely lodged in Congress. The treaty with Spain still existed, it was made by the Constitution the supreme law of the land, and had Spain violated on her part every article of that treaty, still the Executive of the United States, who is bound to see the laws "faithfully executed," must, in good faith towards Spain, have observed on our part that treaty; and the obligation of preserving the peace of the nation would have remained until the treaty should have been revoked or annulled by Congress. Furnishing the Indians with arms, ammunitions, and supplies, were so many violations of treaty stipulations, and might have been considered good cause of war by Congress; but of this General Jackson was not the judge. His duty was pointed out. It was to subdue and punish the Seminole Indians, with whom we were at war. For this purpose he was ordered to pursue them into the territorial limits of Spain, and over a part of which territory those Indians had, at least, a qualified right of possession and property. Under these orders no act of aggression on the Spanish authorities could have been designed, nor can any such acts be justified. Spain, before she could become or be made a party to this war, must have merged her neutral character in that of the enemy, and clearly identified herself with the Seminole Indians, and, by acts of open and undisguised hostility to General Jackson, have opposed him by physical, not moral force.

But the weakness of the Spanish authorities is urged in justification of this outrage upon our Constitution. And is the weakness of an independent Power to disparage their neutral rights, or furnish pretences for a powerful neighbor to weaken them further by hostile aggressions? And is it thus we are to be furnished, by an American officer, with a justification for the dismemberment of Poland, the capture of the Danish fleet by Great Britain, and the subjugation of Europe by Bonaparte! and shall the United States be called upon to imitate the example, or silently acquiesce and thereby subscribe to doctrines and approve measures that are in direct opposition to the repeated and invariable declarations of the Government, given to this nation and the world, through the official medium of Presidential Messages and the correspondence of all her public Ministers, and sanctioned by all her public laws on the subject of neutral rights? Will it not be said that we have changed our national policy? Shall we not be addressed in the following language, by the nations of Europe?

"The time was, when the United States were also weak, she had no navy, she had no army. In those days, she was a strong advocate for neutral rights, anxious that free ships should make free goods; that the neutral flag of the Republic should protect all sailing under it, ever protesting against, and complaining of, the violation of her neutral rights by the belligerents of Europe. But these times have passed away; the nation has tried her strength in battle, and found herself quite equal to the struggle; she has had time to strengthen her army and increase her navy; her former weakness forgotten, her former precepts abandoned, and feeling power and forgetting right, she walks over a prostrate Constitution to conquer and subdue a miserable and feeble, though neutral colony, whose very weakness (pleaded in excuse for the aggression) should have rather constituted an appeal to a generous people for protection."

In this unfavorable light, the committee have too much reason to fear, will the civilized world view this transaction, and, if sanctioned by the nation, they regret to say, there will be too much reason given thus to consider it.

But there are still other reasons disclosed and facts developed, that discover the motives of the commanding officer more fully than those above stated. More than two months after this campaign had ended, and the Seminole war was terminated, another expedition is planned, and the land and naval forces of the United States ordered to execute it; which is to reduce the fortress of St. Augustine, the capital of East Florida. The reasons offered for this measure are stated in his orders to General Gaines, dated Nashville, August 7, 1818, and are as follows:

"I have noted with attention Major Twigg's letter, marked No. 6. I contemplated that the agents of Spain, or the officers at Fort St. Augustine, would excite the Indians to hostility, and furnish them with the means of war. It will be necessary to obtain evidence substantiating this fact, and that the hostile Indians have been fed and furnished from the garrison of St. Augustine. This being obtained, should you deem your force sufficient, you will proceed to take and garrison Fort St. Augustine with American troops, and hold the garrison prisoners until you hear from the President of the United States, or transport them to Cuba, as, in your judgment, under existing circumstances, you may think best.

"Let it be remembered, that the proceedings carried on by me, or this order, is not on the ground that we are at war with Spain; it is on the ground of self-preservation, bottomed on the broad basis of the law of nature and of nations, and justified by giving peace and security to our frontiers; hence, the necessity of procuring evidence of the fact of the agents or officers of Spain having excited the Indians to continue the war against us, and that they have furnished them with the means of carrying on the war; this evidence being obtained, you will (if your force is sufficient) permit nothing to prevent you from reducing Fort St. Augustine, except a positive order from the Department of War.

"Orders some time since have been given to the officer of the ordnance, commanding at Charleston, to have in readiness a complete battering train, the number and calibre of the guns pointed out. I have no doubt you will find them in readiness.

"I enclose you the report of Captain Henley, of the naval force on that station; you will open a correspondence with Commandant A. J. Dallas, to insure his co-operation, provided it should be required."

In this projected expedition, it was not thought necessary or expedient to consult the Executive branch of the Government; the order sent to Gen. Gaines was peremptory, on the discovery being made that the Indians had been supplied with ammunition and provisions, and excited to war; the blow was to be struck, and nothing but an express order from the Secretary of War was to prevent it. Long before this period, the commanding general had, by his letters to the Secretary of War, declared the Seminole war at an end, and after which not a single new act of hostility had been committed. Yet, in this state of peace, is a military officer directed to ascertain certain facts, and, on such facts being substantiated, to make war on the neutral colony of a nation in peace and amity with the United States; thus disregarding not only the legislative and executive authorities of the United States, but setting at naught the usages of all civilized nations, by making war without a previous and public declaration. Were this nation subject to the will of a military despot, and were there no Constitutional barriers to the inordinate exercise of military ambition, more than this could scarcely have been expected. It is with pain the committee are constrained to make these observations; but, where the vital principles of the Constitution have been violated, as they conceive, it would be criminal in them, under the instructions they have received from the Senate, and the duty they owe the nation, to be silent. Silence on their part would have been considered an acquiescence in those measures, and they fear this precedent and example may be pleaded and followed on future occasions.

If these things be admitted in the South, will they not be considered as authorized in the North? Are there not fortresses there to be won, and provinces to be conquered; and are there not Indians in that quarter likewise, and may not the officer in command find means to prove that those Indians have been, or hereafter may be, furnished by the British with arms and munitions of war; and, if so, may he not follow the example set in the South, and add something to his stock of military fame by reducing the British fortresses of Canada, and unfurling the star-spangled banner of this nation on the walls of Quebec?

We hope better things of the distinguished officer at the head of our armies, and we had hoped better things of the hero of New Orleans, but we have been disappointed; and if the conduct of the officers in the South be sanctioned and approved by the nation, we are free to declare that the reduction of Quebec (where Montgomery fell, unable to conquer) would present a much stronger claim to public approbation.

It is necessary here to remark, that a copy of the order issued by General Jackson to General Gaines, for the reduction of St. Augustine, was transmitted to the Secretary of War, and a countermanding order promptly despatched to General Gaines, which reached him before the military expedition set on foot by General Jackson had commenced; and thus was suddenly arrested a military scheme, as unconstitutional as it was impolitic, and which might, as stated by the Secretary of War in his letter of the 8th day of September, 1818, have involved this nation in a war with all Europe.

In thus promptly prohibiting the unauthorized seizure, at the will of a commanding general, of the possessions of a neighboring nation with whom the United States are at peace, the committee recognise that sacred regard to the rights of other nations, which ought never to be departed from by the Executive of a free country, and that vigilant attention to the conduct of the officers of the army which is necessary to secure a due subordination of the military to the civil power.

They consider that, on this occasion, the Executive of the United States has, by promptly restoring St. Marks and Pensacola, wrested from Spain in violation of instructions, pursued the course that the Constitution demanded, that all former precedents justified, and to which the public sentiment gave a decided approbation.

In reviewing the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, your committee cannot but consider it as an unnecessary act of severity, on the part of the commanding general, and a departure from that mild and humane system towards prisoners, which, in all our conflicts with savage or civilized nations, has heretofore been considered, not only honorable to the national character, but conformable to the dictates of sound policy. These prisoners are subjects of Great Britain, with whom the United States are at peace. Having left their country, and united their fate with savages, with whom the United States were at war, they forfeited their claim to the protection of their own Government, and subjected themselves to the same treatment, which might, according to the practice and principles of the American Government, be extended towards those with whom they were associated. No process of reasoning can degrade them below the savages with whom they were connected. As prisoners of war they were entitled to claim from the American Government that protection which the most savage of our foes have uniformly experienced when disarmed and in our power.

Humanity shudders at the idea of a cold-blooded execution of prisoners, disarmed, and in the power of the conqueror. And, although savages, who respect no laws, may, according to the strict principles of the law of nations, have their own system of cruelty inflicted on them by way of retaliation, it is believed that such a system would degrade and debase the civilized nation who should resort to it, and is not only repugnant to the mild principles of the Christian religion, but a violation of those great principles of moral rectitude which distinguish the American character. Retaliation in the United States has always been confined to specified acts of cruelty. It is not believed that any attempt has ever been made to retaliate for charges so general as those exhibited against Arbuthnot and Ambrister, viz: "Inciting the Indians to war." During the Revolutionary war, only two cases occurred of persons seized for purposes of retaliation, neither of whom was executed. The case of Asgill, seized on account of the murder of Huddy; and Governor Hamilton, of Vincennes, for specific acts of cruelty also. Hamilton was confined for a short time with rigor, and afterwards released. During the late war, marked with some cases of cold-blooded massacre on the part of our enemy, particularly the one at the river Raisin, no such measure as retaliation was resorted to.

The principle assumed by the commanding general, that Arbuthnot and Ambrister, by uniting in war against the United States, while we were at peace with Great Britain, "became outlaws and pirates, and liable to suffer death," is not recognised in any code of national law. Nothing can be found in the history of civilized nations, which recognises such a principle, except a decree of the Executive Directory of France, during their short career of folly and madness, which declares that neutrals, found on board enemy's ships, should be considered and treated as pirates.*

The committee forbear to make any other remarks on the violation of the usual and accustomed forms in the punishment and conviction of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, except that even despots claiming to exercise absolute power cannot, with propriety, violate their own rules.

Having detailed a court martial, for the purpose of trying the prisoners, the commanding general, by his own authority, set aside the sentence of the court, and substituted for that sentence his own arbitrary will. In trials involving the life of an individual, a strict adherence to form is in ordinary cases considered the best security against oppression and injustice.

A departure from these forms is calculated to inflict a wound on the national character and tarnish the laurels so justly acquired by the commanding general by his former victories. Such are the facts, as they appear to the committee, and such are the views taken by them of the important subjects referred to their consideration, and, together with their report, they submit various depositions and documents, to which, and to the correspondence and documents relating to the Seminole war, communicated to the Senate by the President of the United States, at the last and present session, they refer.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. H. NELSON in the Chair, on the state of the Union, and took into consideration the Message of the President of the United States, yesterday received.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved sundry resolutions, for reference of the different parts of the Message, to the following effect:

1. That so much as relates to the subject of foreign affairs, and to the independence of the South American States, be referred to a select committee.
2. That so much as relates to military affairs, and so much as relates to the proceedings of the courts martial on the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, and to the conduct of the war with the Seminole Indians, be referred to a select committee.
3. That so much as relates to the Navy and to the naval depots, be referred to a select committee.
4. That so much as relates to cessions of territory from the Indians, be referred to the Committee of Public Lands.
5. That so much as relates to the civilization of the Indian tribes, be referred to a select committee.
6. That so much as relates to the subject of manufactures, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.
7. That so much as relates to the unlawful introduction of slaves into the United States, be referred to a select committee.
8. That so much as relates to the subject of revenue, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.
9. That so much as relates to the District of Columbia, be referred to the Committee for said District.
10. That the said committees have leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

These resolutions were severally agreed to without opposition or remark; and

Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Barbour, of Virginia, Mr. Spencer, Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Allen, of Vermont, and Mr. Hopkinson, were appointed a committee pursuant to the first resolution.

Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky, Mr. Reed, Mr. T. M. Nelson, Mr. Huntington, Mr. Gage, Mr. Stewart, of North Carolina, and Mr. Peter, were appointed a committee pursuant to the second resolution.

Mr. Pleasants, Mr. Silsbee, Mr. Parrott, Mr. Sawyer, Mr. Schuyler, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Bate-man, were appointed a committee pursuant to the third resolution.

Mr. Southard, Mr. Williams, of New York, Mr. Murray, Mr. Walker, of North Carolina, Mr. Richards, Mr. Butler, of New Hampshire, and Mr. Pegram, were appointed a committee pursuant to the fifth resolution.

Mr. Middleton, Mr. Upham, Mr. Lawyer, Mr. Floyd, Mr. Mumford, Mr. Lincoln, and Mr. Linn, were appointed a committee pursuant to the seventh resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR then submitted four other resolutions, to this effect:

1. That a committee be appointed to consider and report on the subject of the organization and discipline of the militia.
2. That a committee be appointed on the subject of internal improvement.
3. That a committee be appointed on the subject of the public buildings.
4. That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any amendment should be necessary to the act of the last session granting pensions to Revolutionary survivors.

Mr. TAYLOR remarked, on these resolves, that it would be seen they embraced subjects not referred to in the President's Message; but he believed it to be entirely consistent with parliamentary practice, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to present for consideration any or all the important subjects likely to come before Congress during the session. Among these subjects, he thought, were those embraced in these resolutions. Among them, that of the organization and discipline of the militia was unquestionably of immense importance; the subject was, indeed, among the unfinished business of last session, but he thought it proper to raise a committee on it, that any propositions for improving or amending the system might be referred to it. The subject of roads and canals, too, though not noticed in the Message, was also lying over from the last session, and it was probable that other propositions of that character might be made during the session. The subject of the public buildings was one which had excited some interest and some inquiry into the causes of the disappointment of the reasonable expectations entertained that they would have been in a greater state of forwardness than they are at present: a committee would properly be appointed to inquire into the matter. The subject of Revolutionary pensions, also, incidentally noticed only in the Message, had produced some excitement in the country, and a disposition prevailed among some to restrict, and among others to enlarge, the provisions of the law on the subject. This, therefore, appeared to him to deserve the attention of the House. He thought the subjects all of sufficient moment to justify the reference of them to committees.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, objected to acting on these subjects, as proposed, on the ground that they did not flow from the Message; and that it had been usual, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the President's Message, not to introduce any proposition foreign to the Message. He thought the practice a good one, and did not wish to depart from it without strong reason. He therefore moved that these propositions lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR said that, being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, everything relating to the public concerns was fully before them. He did not think it important that his motion should originate in committee, but he protested against being limited, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, although the Message had been referred to it, to the range of subjects embraced in that document.

The resolves were ordered to lie on the table, by a vote of 61 to 50.

The Committee rose, and reported the resolves previously agreed to, which were concurred in by the House.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved, anew, the propositions last above stated, which in committee had been ordered to lie on the table.

After some conversation as to the manner, rather than the matter of the resolves, in which Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, TAYLOR, HARRISON, and POINDEXTER took part, the resolves were agreed to.

Mr. Harrison, Mr. Alexander Smyth, Mr. Quarles, Mr. Morton, Mr. Jones, Mr. Savage, and Mr. Owen, were appointed a committee pursuant to the first resolution.

Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, Mr. Storrs, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Sergeant, Mr. Porter, Mr. Crafts, and Mr. Marchand, were appointed a committee pursuant to the second resolution.

Mr. Bassett, Mr. Bellinger, Mr. Adams, Mr. Clagett, Mr. Folger, Mr. Bayley, and Mr. Rice, were appointed a committee pursuant to the third resolution.

Mr. Bloomfield, Mr. Burwell, Mr. Ogle, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Drake, Mr. Herkimer, and Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, were appointed a committee pursuant to the fourth resolution.

A resolution of the Senate, for appointing a joint Library Committee, was taken up and agreed to.

A resolution for the appointment of a Chaplain to each House, was also agreed to.

The House then proceeded to ballot for a Chaplain on its part. Rev. Burgess Allison was nominated by Mr. BLOOMFIELD, and Dr. William Rogers by Mr. SERGEANT. The votes being counted out, were found to be—for Rev. Burgess Allison 72, Dr. Wm. Rogers 52.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, enclosing the credentials of SAMUEL MOORE, as a member of this House, in the room of Samuel D. Ingham, resigned; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the officers of the Army of the United States, their grade, where stationed, the number on duty, and those on furlough, with the period of furlough; made in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 20th of April last; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. IRVING, of New York, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending for the further term of five years the pensions heretofore granted to the widows and orphans of the officers, sailors, and marines, who were killed on board the armed ships of the United States during the late war.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the fourth resolution submitted at the last session, (December 9, 1817,) by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the Assistant Postmaster General.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment for property lost or destroyed by the enemy; and for horses lost for want of forage, during the late war between the United States and the Seminole nation of Indians.

STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. McLEAN, Representative from the new State of Illinois, being in attendance—

The SPEAKER stated to the House a difficulty which he felt in deciding upon the propriety of administering the oath to him, in consequence of Congress not having concluded the act of admission of the State into the Union. Under this difficulty, he submitted the question to the decision of the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, said he thought it incumbent on the House, before admitting the Representative to a seat, to examine the constitution just laid before it, to see, first, whether the requisitions of the act of last session were complied with; and, secondly, whether the form of government established was republican, which the United States were bound to guaranty. He illustrated the irregularity of a different procedure, by putting the case that the member was admitted to a seat, allowed to vote on important questions, and the constitution subsequently rejected.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, wished a different course to be pursued, and one for which he adduced precedent, in the case of the Representative from one of the States lately admitted. The House had taken for granted the fact of a compliance with the law, and of the republican form of government established, and had admitted the member without question to his seat. In the present case, Mr. H. was unwilling to depart from the precedent, for mere form's sake.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, said that this was a question which, he believed, had never before been presented to the House. He thought, for himself, that, before admitting a Representative to a seat, the question, whether the people who elected him were a State, ought to be decided. To the decision of this question, several things were necessary: for instance, the law of last session required that the Territory in question should have had a certain population, to justify its forming a constitution and State government. This fact ought to be officially established, &c. and the resolution of admission passed, before a Representative took his seat.

The question having been put, it was decided apparently by a large majority that the SPEAKER should not at this time administer the oath of office.

Ordered, That the constitution of the State of Illinois be referred to a select committee; and Messrs. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, POINDEXTER, and HENDRICKS, were appointed the said committee.

FRIDAY, November 20.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial and petition of Matthew Lyon, formerly a member of the House of Representatives from the State of

NOVEMBER, 1818.

State of Illinois.

H. OF R.

Vermont, detailing the circumstances attending his prosecution for sedition, in the year 1798, and complaining of the unconstitutionality of the act under which he was prosecuted, of illegality in the proceedings of the court, and of the fine which he was compelled to pay, and the imprisonment he suffered; and also setting forth the iniquity of the motives which prompted the said prosecution; and praying that the amount of the said fine, with the interest thereon, may be granted to him, together with such sum as Congress may think a just indemnity for his being dragged from his home, his family, friends, and business, and thrown into a loathsome dungeon, where he suffered every species of hardship and indignity, which the most persecuting spirit could devise, for four months.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to refer the petition to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, thought, that, as this petition embraced a claim, it would be proper to let it take the course of all other claims, by referring it to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS, said, though it was a claim, it was a claim arising from the operation of a law of the country supposed by the petitioner to be unconstitutional. Who could so well determine a question with regard to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a law, as the Judiciary Committee? Such cases had been usually referred to that committee; and even at the last session that committee had been directed to inquire into a fraud, said to have been committed in one of the courts of the United States.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, of New York, the petition was read through, and was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the duty on salt imported into the United States.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, the Message of the President of the United States, of the 18th of January, 1816, recommending the confirmation of certain grants or reservations of lands, made by the friendly Creek Indians to Major General Andrew Jackson, Benjamin Hawkins, and others, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the emigration and settlement of the Choctaw tribe of Indians, on the land of the United States, west of the river Mississippi, until they shall have acquired that right by treaty with the United States, founded on a cession of lands inhabited by said tribe of Indians, east of the river Mississippi.

STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, from the select committee, to whom was referred the constitution of the State of Illinois, reported a resolution, declaring the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States.

The resolution was read a first and second time.—Mr. ANDERSON proposed that it should be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, inquired whether it appeared, from any documents transmitted to Congress, that the State had the number of inhabitants required by the law of the last session, as a preliminary to its formation of a constitution.

Mr. ANDERSON said, that the committee had no information on that subject before them, beyond what was contained in the preamble to the constitution, which states, that the requisitions of the act of Congress had been complied with, and that the convention had therefore proceeded to the formation of a constitution. Mr. A. said, the committee had considered that evidence sufficient; and he had, in addition, himself seen, in the newspapers, evidence sufficient to satisfy him of the fact, that the population did amount to forty thousand souls, the number required.

The resolve was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MONDAY, November 23.

Several other members to wit: from New York, DANIEL CRUGER, PETER H. WENDOVER, and CALEB TOMPKINS; from South Carolina, JAMES ERVIN, ELIAS EARLE, and ELDRED SIMKINS; appeared and took their seats.

Mr. HUGH NELSON presented a memorial of William Lambert, accompanied with abstracts of astronomical calculations, to ascertain the longitude of the Capitol in this city, from the observatory of Greenwich in England, soliciting the adoption of measures authorizing additional observations to be made to test the accuracy of the result already obtained; which was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. HUGH NELSON, FOLGER, SEYBERT, CRAWFORD, and BATEMAN, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented a petition of William Jackson, solicitor on behalf of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army of the United States, praying that an act may be passed directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the claim of each surviving officer of the said army, who, by the resolves of Congress, was entitled to half pay for life, calculating the amount of the principal of the arrearages, from the time of his reduction, and deducting therefrom five years full pay; and, the balance of arrearages being thus ascertained, to issue a certificate, bearing interest, to the officer for the amount of said balance; and the officer to be thenceforth entitled to receive half pay, in half yearly payments, for, and during the time of his natural life, which petition was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, SIMKINS, MERCER, HOPKINSON, and SPENCER, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, he was excused from serving on the Committee of Public Buildings, on the ground that he was unacquainted with architecture, either in theory or practice, and that he had at the last session voted against the appropriation even for the commencement of some of those buildings; and another member [Mr. AUSTIN] was appointed in his place.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the employment of a number of clerks (not exceeding twelve) in the Department of War, and Messrs. HARRISON, PEGRAM, and COMSTOCK, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, to prevent the discontinuance of suits in the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, on account of said court not having been holden on the day prescribed by law, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting sundry documents showing the state and condition of the Navy Pension Fund, the sources from whence it arises, its amount, the manner in which it is collected, the sums received yearly from each State, since the 20th June, 1812; exhibited in obedience to a resolution of this House, of the 8th of April last; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER communicated to the House a letter addressed to him by JOHN FORSYTH, containing notice of the resignation of his seat in this House, as one of the members for the State of Georgia.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from William Cranch, Chief Justice of the circuit court of the United States, for the District of Columbia, transmitting a code of jurisprudence for the said district, prepared (by him) under the authority of the act of the 29th of April, 1816, entitled "An act authorizing the Judges of the circuit court, and the Attorney for the District of Columbia, to prepare a code of jurisprudence for the said District," which was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. HERBERT, CYLERETH, GARNETT, WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, and ADAMS, were appointed the said committee. The letter is as follows:

NOVEMBER 9, 1818.

SIR: The undersigned, one of the Judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia, has the honor to present, for the consideration of Congress, a Code of Jurisprudence for that District, prepared under the authority of the act of the 29th of April, 1816, entitled "An act authorizing the Judges of the circuit court, and the Attorney for the District of Columbia, to prepare a Code of Jurisprudence for the said District."

It is to be regretted, that the engagements of the gentlemen intended by that act to have been associated with him, in the business, have deprived the public of the benefit of their labors. This circumstance will in part account for the lateness of the period at which the report is made. It is, however, a work which could not have been hastily done; for, although the District is small, yet almost every case requiring the interposition of law, which can arise in the largest nation, may arise in this District, and ought to be provided for.

In preparing a substitute for the existing statute law, it was necessary, if possible to ascertain what that law was. This was not an easy task.

By the act of Congress, of the 27th of February, 1801, the laws of Virginia, as they then existed, were to remain in force in that part of the District which was ceded by Virginia, and the laws of Maryland in that part which was ceded by Maryland. The laws thus adopted, consisted of so much of the common law of England as was applicable to the situation of this country; of the bills of rights, constitution, and statutes of Virginia and Maryland, modified by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and, also, (in regard to that part of the District which was ceded by the State of Maryland,) of such of the English statutes as existed at the time of the first emigration to Maryland, "and which, by experience, had been found applicable to their local and other circumstances, and of such others as had been since made in England or Great Britain, and had been introduced, used, and practised by the courts of law or equity" of that State.

To ascertain, therefore, what was the existing statute law, it was necessary to know what statutes of England, enacted before the first emigration to Maryland, had by experience been found applicable to the local and other circumstances of the country, and what statutes since made in England or Great Britain, had been introduced, used, and practised by the courts of law or equity in that State: and also what statutes of England or Great Britain had been expressly re-enacted by the State of Virginia.

To obtain this knowledge with as much certainty as the nature of the case would permit, it was necessary to examine minutely the English and British statutes, and compare them with the statutes enacted by Virginia and Maryland.

From these three systems of statutes, to select such as were most important and best adapted to the circumstances of the District; to supply such defects as were discovered, and to combine the whole into one code—required more deliberation, and occupied more time, than was anticipated.

These circumstances must account for the apparent delay in making the present report, which is even now submitted with much diffidence.

With high consideration, the undersigned has the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. CRANCH.

Hon. HENRY CLAY,
Speaker House of Representatives.

ANNUAL TREASURY REPORT.

and tonnage, internal duties, direct tax, public lands, postage, and incidental receipts, during the year 1816, amounted to $36,743,574, 07, viz:

Customs	$27,569,769 71
Internal duties	4,396,133 25
Direct tax	2,785,343 20
Public lands, exclusive of Mississippi stock	1,754,487 38
Postage and incidental receipts	237,840 53

$36,743,574 07

And that which accrued from the same sources during the year 1817, amounted to $24,387,993 08, viz:

Public lands exclusive of Mississippi stock (see statement C)	2,015,977 00

$24,387,993 08

It is ascertained that the gross amount of duties on merchandise and tonnage, which have accrued during the three first quarters of the present year exceeds $21,000,000, and that the sales of the public lands, during the same period, greatly exceed, both in quantity and value, those of the corresponding quarter of last year.

The payments into the Treasury during the three first quarters of the year, are estimated to amount to $17,167,862 26, viz:

Internal revenue and direct tax	993,574 36
Public lands, exclusive of Mississippi stock	1,875,731 20
Interest upon bank dividends	525,000 00
Postage and incidental receipts	49,438 19
Repayments into the Treasury	322,708 86

$17,167,862 26

And the payments into the Treasury during the fourth quarter of the year, from the same sources, are estimated at

5,000,000 00

Making the total amount estimated, to be received into the Treasury during the year 1818

22,167,862 26

Which, added to the balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of January last, exclusive of $8,809,872 10 in Treasury notes, amounting to

6,179,883 38

Makes the aggregate amount of

$28,347,745 64

The application of this sum, for the year 1818, is estimated as follows.

To the 30th September the payments (exclusive of $9,148,237 40 of Treasury notes, which had been drawn from the Treasury and cancelled) have amounted to $16,760,337 05, viz:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses	$3,289,806 28
Military service, including arrearage	5,620,263 08
Naval service, including the permanent appropriation for the gradual increase of the Navy - 2,383,000 00

Public debt, exclusive of the $9,148,237 40 of Treasury notes, which have been drawn out of the Treasury, and cancelled - 5,467,267 69

During the 4th quarter it is estimated that the payments will amount to $9,475,000, viz:

Civil, diplomatic, miscellaneous expenses 520,000 00

Military service - 1,175,000 00

Naval service - 575,000 00

Public debt to 1st of January, 1819 - 7,205,000 00

Making the aggregate amount of - $26,235,337 05

And leaving, on the 1st day of January 1819, a balance in the Treasury, estimated at

Of the Public Debt.

The Public Debt, which was contracted before the year 1812, and which was unredeemed on the 1st day of October, 1817, as appears by statement (1.) amounted to - $31,835,788 29

By the same statement it appears that the funded debt contracted subsequent to the 1st day of January, 1812, amounted to - 68,071,933 14

Making together the aggregate amount of - $99,907,721 43

Which sum agrees with the statement of the unredeemed amount, on the 1st day of October, 1817, as per last report, excepting the sum of $4,123 98 over estimated, and which has now been corrected by actual settlement.

On the 1st day of January, there was added to the amount, for Treasury notes brought into the Treasury and cancelled, and for which the following stock was issued, viz:

In six per cent. stock - 234,422 10

In seven per cent. stock - 99,019 00

Making the public debt which was unredeemed on the 1st of January, 1818, per statement (2.) amount to - $99,107,346 95

From which deduct the amount of stock purchased and redeemed during that period per statement (4) - 415,993 87

And also the estimated amount of the final reimbursement of the old 6 per cent. stock - 709,312 03

And the estimated reimbursement of the deferred six per cent. stock - 230,401 76

Making on that day, as appears by statement (3,) the aggregate amount of - 97,825,434 78

Since the 30th September there has been redeemed, or provision made for the redemption of a moiety of the Louisiana stock, unpaid on the 1st October, 1818 - 4,977,950 00

By statement (5) the Treasury notes which are yet in circulation, are estimated at - $297,506 00

By statement (6) it appears that the whole of the awards made by the commissioners appointed under the several acts for indemnifying certain claimants of public lands, amount to - 4,282,151 12

Of which sum there has been received at the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as appears by statement C, the sum of - 1,026,684 00

Leaving outstanding, at the date of the several returns from the land districts, the sum of - $3,255,467 12

It is proper to observe, however, that extensive sales were made in the Alabama Territory, in the months of September, October, and November, of which no returns have yet been received.

Of the Estimates of the Public Revenue and Expenditures for the year 1819.

In the annual report of the state of the Treasury, of the 5th of December, 1817, the permanent revenue was estimated at $24,525,000 per annum; and the annual expenditure, according to the then existing laws, was stated at $21,946,351 74. By the acts of the last session of Congress, the internal duties, estimated at $2,500,000 per annum, were repealed, whilst the expenditure was augmented to nearly $25,000,000; and that of the ensuing year is estimated at not less than $24,515,219 76.

The apparent deficit produced by these acts, and by the application of more than $2,500,000 to the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal of the public debt, beyond the annual appropriation of $10,000,000 for that object, has been supplied by the receipts into the Treasury on account of the arrearage of the direct tax and internal duties, and by the balance of more than $6,000,000, which was in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1818.

These temporary sources of supply being nearly exhausted, the expenditure of the year 1819 must principally depend upon the receipts into the Treasury from the permanent revenue during that year. As was anticipated in the last annual report, the reaction produced by the excessive importations of foreign merchandise, during the years 1815 and 1816, acquired its greatest force in the year 1817.

It is presumed that the revenue which shall accrue during the present year from imports and tonnage, may be considered as the average amount which will be annually received from that source of the revenue.

It is ascertained that the bonds taken for securing duties which were outstanding on the 30th day of September last exceeded $23,000,000, and the receipts into the Treasury from that source of revenue during the year 1819 are estimated at - $21,000,000 00

Public Lands - 1,500,000 00

Direct Tax and Internal Duties - 750,000 00

Bank Dividends at six per cent. - 420,000 00

First payment of bonus due by Bank of the United States - 500,000 00

Postage and incidental receipts - 50,000 00

Amounting together to - $24,220,000 00

Which, added to balance in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1819, estimated at - 2,112,408 59

Makes the aggregate amount of - $26,332,408 59

The probable authorized demands on the Treasury during the year 1819 are estimated to amount to the sum of $24,515,219 76, viz:

Civil, Diplomatic, and Miscellaneous Expenses - $1,619,836 31

Military Department, including the Indian Department, permanent Indian annuities, military and Revolutionary pensions, and arming the militia - 8,666,252 85

Navy Department, including one million dollars for the gradual increase of the navy - 3,802,486 60

Public Buildings, and for discharging the demands of the contractors for making the Cumberland road - 326,644 00

Public Debt - 10,000,000 00

NOVEMBER, 1818.

State of Illinois—Slavery.

H. OF R.

For building custom-houses and public warehouses at New Orleans and other ports - 100,000 00

Total of estimated demands - $24,515,219 76

Which being deducted from the amount estimated to be received into the Treasury, including the balance on the first day of January, 1819 - 26,232,408 59

Leaves a balance in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1820, of - $1,717,188 83

In presenting this estimate of receipts for the year 1819, it is necessary to premise that the sum to be received from the customs is less than what, from the amount of the outstanding bonds, would under ordinary circumstances be received. The amount of the sales of public lands during the last year, and the sum due at this time by the purchasers, would justify a much higher estimate of the receipts from that important branch of revenue, if the most serious difficulty in making payments was not known to exist. The excessive issues of the banks during the suspension of specie payments, and the great exportation of the precious metals to the East Indies during the present year, have produced a pressure upon them which has rendered it necessary to contract their discounts for the purpose of withdrawing from circulation a large proportion of their notes. This operation, so oppressive to their debtors, but indispensably necessary to the existence of specie payments, must be continued until gold and silver shall form a just proportion of the circulating currency. In passing through this ordeal, punctuality in the discharge of debts, both to individuals and to the Government, will be considerably impaired, and well founded apprehensions are entertained that, until it is passed, payments in some of the land districts will be greatly diminished.

The extent to which the payments into the Treasury, during the year 1819, will be affected by the general pressure upon the community, which has been described, and which is the inevitable consequence of the overtrading of the banks and the exportation of specie to the East Indies, aggravated by the temporary failure of the ordinary supply of the precious metals from the Spanish American mines, cannot, at this time, be correctly appreciated. Should it exceed what has been contemplated in this report, the appropriations must be diminished, the revenue enlarged by new impositions, or temporary loans authorized to meet the deficiency. As the expenditure of the year 1820 will be greatly reduced by the irredeemable quality of the public debt, after the redemption of the remaining moiety of the Louisiana stock, which may be effected on the 21st day of October, 1819, a resort to temporary loans, or to the issue of Treasury notes, to the amount of the deficiency, should any occur, is believed to be preferable to the imposition of new taxes, which would not be required after that year.

All which is respectfully submitted.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

STATE OF ILLINOIS—SLAVERY.

The engrossed resolution declaring the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, was read a third time; and on the question, Shall it pass?

Mr. TALLMADGE, of New York, assigned the reasons why, in his opinion, the resolution ought not to be adopted. It appeared to him, in the first place, he said, there ought to be before Congress some document, showing that the Territory had the population required by the law of the last session. The recitation of the fact in the preamble of the constitution he did not consider as the proper sort of evidence. It was not, however, upon this point that he meant to rest his opposition to the adoption of the resolution. The principle of slavery, if not adopted in the constitution, was at least not sufficiently prohibited. The ordinance for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio, which was in the nature of a convention between the United States and the people of the States and Territories to be formed out of that territory, contained some provisions applicable to this subject. The sixth article of that ordinance provided that, in the cession of territory accepted by the United States from Virginia, and comprising the whole northwestern territory, there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, otherwise than as a punishment for the commitment of crimes; with a proviso, that this provision should not be construed to prevent the reclamation of runaway slaves. If the constitution was found to comport with that provision, it ought to be received by Congress; if not, it ought to be rejected. The sixth article of the constitution of the new State of Illinois,* in each of its three sections, Mr. T.

*ART. 6. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall hereafter be introduced into this State, otherwise than for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; nor shall any male person, arrived at the age of twenty-one years, nor female person arrived at the age of eighteen years, be held to serve any person as a servant, under any indenture hereafter made, unless such person shall enter into such indenture while in a state of perfect freedom, and on condition of a bona fide consideration received, or to be received, for that service. Nor shall any indenture of any negro or mulatto, hereafter made and executed out of this State, or, if made in this State, where the term of service exceeds one year, be of the least validity, except those given in cases of apprenticeship.

SEC. 2. No person bound to labor in any other State shall be hired to labor in this State, except within the tract reserved for the salt works, near Shawneetown; nor even at that place for a longer period than one year at any one time; nor shall it be allowed there after the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five; any violation of this article shall effect the emancipation of such person from his obligation to service.

SEC. 3. Each and every person who has been bound to service by contract or indenture, in virtue of the laws of the Illinois Territory, heretofore existing, and in conformity to the provisions of the same, without fraud or collusion, shall be held to a specific performance of their contracts or indentures; and such negroes and mulattoes as have been registered in conformity with the aforesaid laws, shall serve out the time appointed by said laws: Provided, however, That the children hereafter born of such persons, negroes, contended, contravened this stipulation, either in the letter or the spirit. These sections he separately examined, as to their construction and bearing, and felt himself constrained to come to the conclusion that they embraced a complete recognition of existing slavery, if not provisions for its future introduction and toleration; particularly in the passage wherein they permit the hiring of slaves, the property of non-residents, for any number of years consecutively. If Congress would observe in good faith the terms of the convention, he said, they were bound, under this circumstance, to reject the constitution of Illinois, or at least this feature of it. The State of Virginia, he said, had ceded the territory out of which this State was formed, on certain conditions, to the United States; one of which was that to which he had just adverted, and it was a monument to the fame of Virginia. It had often been cast as a reproach on this nation, that we, who boast our freedom, and pride ourselves on our independence, yet hold our fellow-beings in service. Americans had been represented, indeed, with one hand exhibiting the declaration of independence, and with the other brandishing the lash of despotism. When this stigma was attempted to be fixed on our country, it was a consolation to him, he said, that we have it in our power to cast it back again on the country from which we are severed—hers was the original sin, which we found in existence on our emancipation, and which it had been impossible to eradicate—we could do no more than control and regulate the evil. So far from wishing to invade the rights of the slaveholding States, or to assail their prerogatives, he believed they were equally sensible with him of the evils of slavery, and did what they could to control and regulate them. But, Mr. T. said, if Congress should voluntarily recognise this feature in a constitution submitted for their decision, and in violation, too, of a compact forbidding it, they would take upon themselves the unjust imputation he had alluded to. Mr. T. referred to the constitution of the State of Indiana, a State already admitted from the same territory, to show how carefully and scrupulously it had guarded against slavery, in any shape, and in the strongest terms reprobated it; and lest at some future day amendments to the constitution should admit its introduction, a clause of that constitution forbade any amendment of that sort to be made. These sentiments of the State of Indiana, Mr. T. said, he reciprocated. Our interest and our honor, said he, calls on us rigidly to insist on the observance of good faith under the article of the ordinance I have referred to, so far as that no involuntary service be permitted to be recognised in the constitution of any State to be formed out of that territory.

or mulattoes, shall become free, the males at the age of twenty-one years, the females at the age of eighteen years. Each and every child born of indentured parents shall be entered with the clerk of the county in which they reside, by their owners, within six months after the birth of said child.—Constitution of Illinois.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, said he fully concurred with the gentleman from New York, in his solicitude to expel from our country, whenever practicable, anything like slavery. It is not with us, said he, a matter of choice whether we will have slaves among us or not: we found them here, and we are obliged to maintain and employ them. It would be a blessing, could we get rid of them; but the wisest and best men among us have not been able to devise a plan for doing it. The only question at present is whether the State of Illinois has virtually complied with her contract, and followed the example of the two other States already erected from the same territory. To illustrate that fact, Mr. P. referred to the constitution of Ohio, the erection of which State, from the Northwestern Territory, the gentleman appeared to have overlooked; and showed that the article on the subject of slaves was almost literally copied from the constitution of Ohio into that of Illinois. The third section of the article in question, in the latter, was the only variation, and the necessity of that additional provision would be obvious to any gentleman who would examine and reflect upon the subject. By an antecedent law of the Territorial government, all persons, slaves or under indenture, in the Territory, were required to be registered, as the only way in which they could be discriminated from fugitives, &c. The constitution directs that their children also shall be registered, that they may be secure of enjoying their freedom, when by the constitution they become entitled. From their color, (being prima facie slaves in other States,) was it not more secure to the freedom of the people of color, that their births, parentage, &c., should be recorded in the new State, than otherwise? So far from constituting an objection to it, Mr. P. said, he considered this a valuable part of the constitution of Illinois. As to children, born of slaves, not being free until eighteen or twenty-one years of age, Mr. P. said that would be no great hardship, seeing it was as soon as white persons were free from their parents, or from their indentures, if apprenticed. With respect to constitutional provisions on this subject, Mr. P. said, after all, it would be found impracticable, after admitting the independence of a State, to prevent it from framing or shaping its constitution as it thought proper. As to a constitution like that of Indiana, prohibiting the introduction of an amendment to it, of whatever nature, if the people were to form a convention to-morrow, that provision would be of no force: the whole power would be with the people, whom, in their sovereign capacity, no provision of that nature can control. Nor could Congress prevent them. Various attempts had already been made in Ohio to alter that feature. In the nature of free governments, no law could be irrevocable; though on this head, he observed, he hoped that neither Ohio, Indiana, nor Illinois, would ever permit the introduction of slavery within their limits. He hoped, as far as we could, we should expel slavery from the country. At the same time, he thought that Illinois, so far as she had gone, had done better than the States which had preceded her in the same quarter, because she had provided for the security of the freedom of negroes, mulattoes, &c., and to prevent them from being kidnapped, by causing them to be registered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, repeated what he had said on Friday last, respecting the population of Illinois, and his own conviction that it was of the required amount. If on this subject Congress had been very scrupulous, Mr. A. said, they would have directed a census of the population to be taken by persons appointed by the United States for that purpose; but they had always heretofore in like cases submitted to Territorial counts and Territorial results, and he did not see why they should not do the same in the present case. All that was necessary was that they should be reasonably satisfied of their accuracy. With respect to the other objection of the gentleman, he thought he could satisfy him that his position was manifestly incorrect. It would be seen, on reading the articles of cession by Virginia, that no condition, such as the gentleman supposed, was annexed to it, respecting slavery. The conditions she required were of a different character, and this provision respecting slavery had been prescribed by Congress, among other articles framed for the government of the Territory thus ceded. Virginia had no concern in it, except so far as she was represented on the floor of Congress, when the ordinance was passed. Still less were the people of the Northwestern Territory a party to the compact, as the gentleman supposed it, not being represented at all, nor consulted on the occasion. Congress then are not in this respect bound by any pledge, nor by anything but a sense of expediency, co-operating with the like sense of the people of Illinois. The conditions reserved by Virginia on making the cession were that a certain number of States should be erected from the Territory, and all existing rights of the people preserved; and, Mr. A. said, there were slaves in the Territory at that day. So far from Virginia requiring the abolition of slavery, doubts had arisen whether, under the stipulations she made on ceding the Territory to the United States, Congress should pass the ordinance which they subsequently enacted. Serious doubts had arisen, after stipulating to make three States, whether Congress had a right to prescribe any condition respecting slavery, &c.; not, Mr. A. said, that he would destroy the ordinance, but he meant to state only how far its scope extended. There was nothing unconstitutional, in any view, in Congress accepting what the people of Illinois have done, if they thought proper; since the consent of the two contracting parties (supposing the ordinance to be a compact) would thus be given. With respect to the nature of the provisions referred to in the constitution, the gentleman who preceded him had clearly shown that they had been misunderstood by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TALLMADGE replied.—In referring to the ordinance, as binding Congress not to permit slavery, in any of the States formed from the Northwestern Territory, he conceived Congress to be bound by a tie not to be broken: but, if in this he was wrong, and Congress are bound by nothing but their sense of expediency, that tie became ten thousand times more strong. Are we, said he, to be drawn into a discussion of slavery, its merits and demerits, on abstract principles? He would not enter into such a discussion; but must persist in stating it as his opinion, that the interest, honor, and faith of the nation, required it scrupulously to guard against slavery's passing into a territory where they have power to prevent its entrance. Mr. T. again enumerated the provisions in the constitution of Illinois, to which he objected, and made further remarks on them. He considered it such, that to accept it, would be to violate a pledge solemnly given, and, if not a stipulation, yet, so simultaneously given, as to amount to a compact with Virginia. With respect to the power of a State to change its constitution, he was not prepared to say that a State was, in that respect, under no restraint. Would gentlemen admit a State into the Union to-day under a republican form of government, and permit it to call a convention to-morrow, and change its form of government to a monarchy? That State would cease, by the very act, to be a component part of the Union, and the same result would follow, he presumed, if a State were to violate the condition on which it was admitted into this Union, by admitting the introduction of slavery.

Mr. LIVERMORE requested the yeas and nays on the decision of this question.

Mr. HARRISON said, that, as a Representative of Ohio, he protested against the doctrine of the gentleman from New York. He could assure the gentleman that the people of that State were fully aware of their privileges, and would never come to this House, or to the State of New York, for permission so to alter their constitution as to admit the introduction of slavery, the object of the gentleman's abhorrence, as, said Mr. H., it is of mine. They had entered into no compact which had shorn the people of their sovereign authority. Mr. H. proceeded to make some remarks respecting the operation of the ordinance, cessions, &c. Though there were slaves in that country when ceded, there had been none in that part of it from which the State of Ohio had been formed, so that no provision had been necessary respecting them in the constitution of that State. In Indiana, the question relating to this description of property had been reserved for the decision of the courts of justice, &c., and he sincerely wished that Illinois had either emancipated its slaves, or followed the example of Indiana. In regard to the supposed compact, however, and its efficacy, Mr. H. said, he had always considered it a dead letter. He could not put his hand on the page, or on the letter, but he believed it would be found that, in one of the pages of the Federalist, the authority of which he presumed, at least, the gentleman from New York would respect, Alexander Hamilton had expressly declared the same opinion. He could not believe, he said, that Congress would refuse to accept the State of Illinois on the ground of that compact: for his part, he wished to see that State, and all that Territory, disenthralled from the effect of articles to which they never gave their assent, and to which they were not properly subject. This much he wished, however he was opposed to slavery, and should lament its introduction into any part of that Territory.

After a few further remarks, from Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. STORRS, the question on the passage of the resolution was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 34, as follows:

TUESDAY, November 24.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL C. ALLEN, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill concerning the western district court of Pennsylvania; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. N., from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Matthew Lyon, praying a reimbursement of the expenses incurred by the prosecution under the act of Congress of July, 1798, commonly called the sedition law, he then being a Representative in Congress from the State of Vermont, made a report thereon, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. N. said, he felt himself constrained to state to the House that, on this question, he had been in a minority in the committee, and wished the subject to be fully laid before the House. He therefore moved that the report be referred for consideration to a Committee of the whole House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINSON, under the instruction of the Judiciary Committee, reported a bill to establish a uniform system of Bankruptcy throughout the United States.

In introducing this bill, Mr. H. remarked, that the bill was in form the same which he had the honor to introduce to the consideration of Congress at their last session. It was not his intention, he said, to fatigue the House by a long argument at present; but he had thought it his duty to bring the subject once more before Congress, and have a vote taken on it, because the necessities of the people demanded it, and in the hope that, during the recess of Congress, the opinions of some gentlemen might have changed, from reflection, or from information derived from others, of the pressing occasion for such a law. Mr. H. hoped that gentlemen would not turn from this question with alarm, but that there would be a fair expression of the opinion of Congress on the subject.

The bill was read, and committed.

Mr. HARRISON, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to increase the number of clerks in the Department of War; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the select committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize the election of a Delegate from the Michigan Territory to Congress, and extending the right of suffrage to the people of said Territory; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. TAYLOR introduced a resolution authorizing the franking of the documents accompanying the President's late Message; which was read three times, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving effect, by law, to an act passed by the General Assembly of the State of Mississippi, entitled "An act making appropriations for the use of the Natchez hospital."

Mr. CAMPBELL was appointed of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, vice Mr. Forsyth resigned.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Richard Bland Lee, late Commissioner of Claims, transmitting a letter from Jacob Dox, soliciting compensation for his services as agent on behalf of the United States, in the taking of evidence in certain claims of great magnitude, on the Niagara frontier of the State of New York; which letters were referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, the committee appointed at the last session of Congress, to inquire into the official conduct of certain judges of the courts of the United States, were discharged from so much of their duty as relates to the conduct of William Stephens, who has resigned his office of judge of the court of the United States for the district of Georgia.

The House then proceeded to the orders of the day, lying over from the last session, which, by a rule of the House, are revived in statu quo, at the expiration of the first week of the present session.

The House first resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means unfavorable to the petition of Daniel Manly and Aaron Walker. Mr. WHITMAN moved to reverse the report; on which motion a debate ensued, wherein Mr. WHITMAN supported, and Messrs. TRIMBLE and SMITH of Maryland, opposed the motion; which was finally negatived by a large majority, and the report adopted. In which the House concurred, on the Speaker's taking the Chair.

NEW JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

The House next resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill, reported at the last session, for erecting a separate judicial district west of the Alleghany mountain, in the State of Virginia.

In the course of the consideration of the bill, among other propositions, was one made by Mr. COLSTON, of Virginia, so to amend the bill as to retain in the eastern circuit, by accepting them from the western, the counties of Hampshire and Hardy; and one by Mr. MCCOY, of Virginia, to leave in the eastern circuit the county of Pendleton; both of which motions were agreed to.

Mr. B. SMITH moved to amend the bill so as to substitute the town of Lewisburg, in Greenbriar county, for Clarksburg and Wythe court-house, so as to have only one place of holding courts, instead of two, as proposed in the bill, and supported his motion by various explanations to establish its propriety.

This motion was opposed by Mr. PINDALL, and was in the end negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to strike out the provision for a salary to the marshal and attorney of the new district, on the ground that no salary had been allowed to those officers in the additional districts created in other States; and that, if any were allowed in this case, it ought to be by a general provision.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, related some facts, showing that there were instances of salary allowed to those officers in some of the additional districts of other States; after which the motion was negatived.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, moved to strike out Wythe court-house, and substitute Giles court-house, as one of the two places of holding the courts of the new district, and made some remarks in support of the motion.

Mr. A. SMYTH opposed the motion, and replied to Mr. FLOYD, who rejoined; and, after some further remarks by Mr. SMYTH, the motion was negatived; and the bill being gone through, and the blanks filled, &c., it was reported to the House, and the amendments of the committee agreed to.

Mr. MCCOY, expressing his embarrassment how to vote on this bill, not being able to perceive any necessity for the proposed division, with the information he at present possessed, asked of the advocates of the measure to exhibit the reasons for its adoption.

Mr. PINDALL entered into a recapitulation of the reasons he had heretofore submitted in support of the justice and expediency of the establishment of the new district; and, after some remarks from Mr. MCCOY in reply, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, as amended, and read a third time.

WEDNESDAY, November 25.

Several other members, to wit: from Virginia, JOHN TYLER, JAMES JOHNSON, and GEORGE F. STROTHER; and, from SOUTH CAROLINA, WILLIAM LOWMEDES, appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of the President, Managers, and Company of the Milford and Oswego Turnpike Road, praying that an act may be passed authorizing a subscription on behalf of the United States to the capital stock of said company.—Referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of William T. Nimmo, which was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill for the relief of the said William T. Nimmo, which was read twice, and committed.

On motion of Mr. SILSSEE, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing, in cases of exportation of goods entitled to debenture, the same time (of twenty days) for completing the export entry and oath, as is allowed by the act of the 20th of April last, for executing the export bonds, in lieu of ten days within which it is now required that the said oath and entry shall be completed.

Mr. WHITMAN offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims be instructed forthwith to prepare and report a bill granting pensions to the individuals in whose favor a bill for that purpose passed this House at the last session, and at the rates and from the periods in the same bill prescribed.

Some debate took place on the relative propriety of acting as proposed, or of waiting for the Senate, in which body the bill fell through at the last session, to revive it. The latter course was supported by Mr. RHEA, and opposed by Mr. WHITMAN. With a view to his object, Mr. RHEA moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was negatived, and the resolution was agreed to.

An engrossed resolution authorizing the transmission of certain documents free of postage, was read the third time, and passed.

The House spent some further time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill of last session, confirming certain claims to land in the Illinois Territory. After considerable debate, in which Messrs. POINDEXTER and HARRISON bore the principal part, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

NEW JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

The engrossed bill to establish a separate judicial district in the State of Virginia, west of the Alleghany mountains, was read a third time; and on the question, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, moved to recommit the bill, for the purpose of amending it, so as to divide the eastern from the western judicial district by county lines, believing that to be a much better dividing line than that established by the bill. [The bill provides that the new district shall be composed of so much of the State of Virginia as is situate west of the summit of the mountains which separate the waters emptying into the Chesapeake bay and Roanoke river from the waters which fall into the Ohio river.]

This motion was opposed by Mr. PINDALL, who, though he admitted some inconvenience might result from the line proposed by the bill, thought it was an inconvenience inseparable from any division, and which would be only varied in its operation, but not changed in its nature, by an amendment such as that proposed by Mr. FLOYD.

The question on recommitment was decided in the negative, and the bill was passed.

DISCONTINUANCE OF SUITS.

The bill to prevent the discontinuance of suits in the western district court of Pennsylvania, in consequence of the court not having been held at the time appointed by law, (because the judge's commission was not received in time,) passed through a Committee of the Whole.

A proposition was made by Mr. PORTER, to amend the bill, so as to allow to the marshal and clerk of the western district of New York, the same salary (two hundred dollars each) as the bill proposes to allow to those of the western district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BALDWIN, to disembarass this bill of any possible objection, as it was important it should pass speedily, moved to strike out the section allowing the salaries in question.

Which being agreed to, Mr. PORTER's motion fell with it; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. SMITH of Maryland in the Chair, on the bill for appointing an additional number of clerks in the War Department.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, an appropriation was inserted for a year's salary to the twelve additional clerks proposed by the bill.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, expressing a desire to be more particularly apprized of the causes which made this increase of clerks in the War Department necessary—

Mr. HARRISON stated that, from the information received from the Secretary of War, the committee who reported the bill had been satisfied of its necessity, to a timely decision on a large mass of applications under the act of the last session, for granting pensions to certain surviving Revolutionary officers. Among other facts, Mr. H. stated, that the applications which had been made under the act of last session, amounted to 19,973; of which 4,200 had been favorably received, 3,400 had been rejected or suspended for further evidence, and 12,373 remain to be decided. In this duty ten clerks had so far been employed, who, considering the labor necessary for examining and stating each claim, had decided on as many as possible. As an additional motive for passing the bill, besides its being the interest of the United States, to ascertain, as soon as possible, the total amount to be provided for, he said many of the applicants, who had formerly enjoyed pensions from the States or the United States, had been deprived of them in consequence of their application for the benefit of the new law, and were now in a state of great distress. In regard to the expense to be caused by the bill, which was limited to one year's duration, it was scarcely material, since so much clerk hire would be necessary for the business, whether it was expended at once to have it done, or protracted in its expenditure for two or three years.

The Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The House then spent some time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act authorizing the sale of certain reserved lots in the City of Washington.

Mr. HERBERT explained the object of the bill to be, to enable the Commissioner of the city to carry into effect the common law, according to the intent of the act of Congress, and conformably to a plat by which Congress had intended those sales should be regulated; an object which was defeated by the wording of the former law.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out the first section of the bill, on the ground that the proceeding proposed to be sanctioned by it would be an interference with private rights, which, he said, ought to be touched with great circumspection at any time. Mr. S. proceeded to state the terms on which the proprietors had surrendered their rights in the land on which the city stands, taking alternate lots or squares, and receiving in addition twenty or twenty-five pounds per acre for the ground included in the public reservations. Any deviation from the plan of the city, which should throw these reservations into the market, these proprietors, he said, would consider as a violation of the contract they had entered into, and were ready, in case of the attempt to do it, to lay injunctions on the proceeding. Besides,

Mr. S. said, if Congress once began to alter the plan of the city, where would they stop? The citizens would be continually coming before them to make alterations, not to beautify the city only, but to serve their own interests. Indeed, he thought Congress must have been surprised into the passage of the law which this bill proposed to amend, or they would not have passed it.

Mr. HERBERT replied, that he had not been in favor of the principle of the original act; but that act had, after deliberation, received the approbation of Congress, and, if it was to have the effect intended when it passed, the amendment now proposed was necessary.

Mr. DESHA said, that, from what had taken place, the subject appeared to be but little understood, and information was wanting to enable the House to act understandingly on it. He, therefore moved that the Committee rise, and ask leave to sit again.

Which was agreed to, and the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not; and particularly to report whether the instalments of the capital stock of the said bank have been paid in gold and silver coin, and in the funded debt of the United States, or whether they were, in any instance, and to what amount, paid by the proceeds of the notes of stockholders, discounted for that purpose; and also to report the names of those persons who now own, or who have owned, any part of the capital stock of the said bank, and the amount of discounts, if any, to such persons respectively, and when made; and also to report whether the said bank, or any of its offices of discount and deposits, have refused to pay the notes of the bank in specie on demand, and have refused to receive in payment of debts due to them, or either of them, the notes of the bank, and whether the bank or any of its offices of discount, or any of their officers or agents have sold drafts upon other offices, or upon the bank, at an advance, and have received a premium for such drafts; also, the amount of the notes issued payable at Philadelphia, and at each office of discount respectively, and the amount of capital assigned to each office, together with the amount of the public deposits made at the bank and at each office, and an account of the transfers thereof, and the total amount of bills and notes discounted at the bank and its several offices since its organization; that the said committee have leave to meet in the city of Philadelphia, and to remain there as long as may be necessary; that they shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ the requisite clerks, the expense of which shall be audited and allowed by the Committee of Accounts, and paid out of the contingent fund of this House.

Mr. SPENCER remarked, on introducing this motion, that it was with considerable reluctance he had submitted it to the House—a reluctance, however, proceeding solely from his inability to do justice to the subject, and not from any doubt of the necessity or of the propriety of the proceeding. He had waited till this day, in the hope that some member, whose experience was more extensive than his own, would have moved the inquiry; but, having been in this respect disappointed, he had felt it his imperious duty to do it. As to the authority of this House to make the investigation, he thought there could be little doubt. If there should be any doubt on the mind of any gentleman on this subject, he referred him to the 23d section of the act establishing the bank, which expressly authorized an examination of the books of the bank, when required, by a committee of Congress. As to the necessity of the inquiry proposed, he presumed there were few of those near him who were not aware of the agitation which exists in the public mind on this subject, and who did not perceive that, from one end of the country to the other, loud complaints were made against the conduct of the officers of the banks. It was necessary for him to state, Mr. S. said, as he did explicitly state, that he meant to implicate the conduct of the bank in no respect; on that point he had formed no opinion, and would form none, until the facts reported by the committee should justify him in drawing his conclusions on the subject. He was neither hostile to the bank, nor particularly friendly; he owed nothing to it; he was the proprietor of none of its stock, nor, that he knew of, were any of his friends. But, that complaints existed against the bank, he well knew; and, whether well or ill-founded, it was equally due to the nation and to the bank that a fair inquiry should take place, and such a report be made as would show that the complaints were unjust, if such should prove to be the fact, or, if otherwise, should exhibit the specific instances of misconduct which the committee should be able to discover. The objects specified in the resolve, Mr. S. said, were all those respecting which, to his knowledge, complaints had been made; and they were subjects respecting which it was at least certain that the nation required information. The friends of the bank, he thought, ought to solicit the inquiry proposed; they should be anxious that a full investigation should take place, and that, too, by a committee having no resentments against the bank to gratify, nor any feelings of friendship or attachment to bias them against it—by a committee, depending on their own inspection for facts, and not on information of a general nature derived from the officers of the bank. A full and fair view of the whole subject, thus obtained, would be attended with the most happy consequences to the nation and to the bank. If it should be shown that immense discounts had not been made to particular persons, for the purpose of speculation merely; that, by this means, the stock of the bank had not been blown up into a bubble which had now burst; that the bank had distributed its accommodations with a view to the accommodation of the community rather than of individuals; that it had used its best exertions to accomplish, what was one of the objects of its establishment, the equalization of the currency, as far as practicable;

if it had done all this, and fairly endeavored to meet the public expectations, although it may have failed in that object, it would become an act of justice to rally around the institution, to sustain and give it credit, because no one could doubt the utility of such an institution to the nation, if properly conducted. With these observations, Mr. S. submitted the resolution to the will of the House.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, rose, he said, not to offer any opposition to the inquiry, but merely to request time to give to the subject of the resolution such a consideration as its importance deserved. It would be recollected by the House, that a resolution had passed the Senate during the last session, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to lay before Congress a particular account of the state and transactions of the bank. This report might be expected shortly to be laid before Congress; and in that report would, perhaps, be embraced all the information required by the resolve. Although rumors had existed, Mr. McL. said, with regard to certain transactions in the bank, he thought it would be well not to institute an inquiry hastily on the foundation of mere rumor. He wished the resolution to lie on the table for a day, or for a longer time, that the House might have time to reflect on it. He, therefore, moved that it lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. SPENCER said he had no sort of objection to this course; but he hoped that, after gentlemen should have reflected on it, they would be disposed to take it up and act on it at an early day.

THURSDAY, November 26.

Another member, to wit: from Ohio, SAMUEL HERRICK appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill concerning invalid pensions, (being in form and substance the same as passed this House during the last session, and fell through in the Senate.) The said bill was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was subsequently read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of Mobile, who pray indemnity for certain losses sustained by encampments of detachments of the Army on or near their property during the late war; and the report was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS also made a report on the petition of Samuel Walker, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill extending the term of half-pay pensions to the widows and children of certain officers, seamen, and marines who died in the public service; which was twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Clerk of the House of Representatives was directed to furnish each standing committee of the House with a volume of the laws of the United States, having relation to the public lands.

Mr. CAMPBELL submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table for one day:

Resolved, That the standing rules of this House be amended, by rescinding rule fifteen, which is in these words:

"After six days from the commencement of a second, or subsequent session, of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports, which originated in this House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined, shall be resumed and acted on, in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, a committee was appointed to prepare and report to this House, a bill granting a pension to Major General John Stark; and Messrs. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, HUNTINGTON, and BLOOMFIELD, were appointed the said committee.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; which was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before the House of Representatives a report from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of January last, requiring a statement of the expenditures upon the public buildings, and an account of their progress to be annually exhibited to Congress.

JAMES MONROE.

NOVEMBER 26, 1818.

The Message and documents were referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit:

An act to increase the number of clerks in the Department of War; an act concerning the western district court of Pennsylvania; and an act concerning invalid pensions; were severally read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of the Library of Congress to the north wing of the Capitol;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

On motion of Mr. MIDDLETON, the bill reported at the last session supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States," passed the 2d of March, 1807, was referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the unlawful introduction of slaves into the United States.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of the Library of Congress to the north wing of the Capitol." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-day. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Mehitable Cole, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, after some remarks in favor of it by Mr. CLAGETT, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. SMITH of Maryland in the chair, on the bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Caron de Beaumarchais.

[The magnitude of this claim makes it an important one, and the long interval of time which has elapsed since the debt was contracted, has at once tripled the amount of the debt, and involved in some obscurity the question of the justice of the claim. In the report of the committee to whom the subject was referred at the last session, and on which this bill is founded, the members of the committee were unanimous. This report, which is an elaborate and able one, was read through to-day by the Clerk. A report of a committee of a former Congress, adverse to the claim, and equally elaborate, was also read through.]

After the reading of these documents—

Mr. BASSETT made a few remarks on the merits of this claim, impressively urging on the House the justice of giving to the claim a liberal and serious consideration. He stated the important services rendered to the United States by M. Beaumarchais, and the reduced fortunes of his heirs. After reading the warm expression of thanks to that gentleman by the Continental Congress, and stating that his aid had essentially contributed to some of the most important and successful events of the Revolutionary war, Mr. B. expressed his hope that the door would not be closed in the face of his representatives, suing for a debt justly due by the United States, and the want of which had impoverished them.

Mr. PITKIN said that this claim was of that nature, and of that amount, too, which required a cool consideration of its nature; and that the House should closely examine into its merits for themselves. With regard to this claim, some of the documents unfavorable to it had been destroyed at the time of the invasion of 1814; others were not generally accessible, or not generally understood. As gentlemen could not have had time to look over the papers at the present session, and it was, withal, growing late, he moved that the Committee should rise, that, on meeting again, gentlemen might be better prepared than at present to go into a consideration of the question.

Whereupon the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, November 27.

Another member, to wit: from Virginia, WILLIAM LEE BALL, appeared, and took his seat.
15th CON. 2d SESS.—11

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Gad Worthington, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, the testimony taken under commissions issued by Richard Bland Lee, Esq., Commissioner of Claims, and all other testimony in relation to the claims for remuneration for property captured and destroyed on the Niagara frontier, in the late war, which were before the Committee of Claims during the last session, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, a committee was appointed to inquire whether it be expedient to make any amendment to the laws which regulate the coins of the United States and foreign coins; and Messrs. SEYBERT, NELSON of Massachusetts, IRVING, and HARRISON, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS M. NELSON, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act passed at the last session of Congress, approved the 14th of April, 1818, entitled "An act regulating the staff of the Army, so as to do away the offices of surgeon general and assistant surgeon general, and to have two surgeons general, corresponding to the present office of assistant surgeon general, with their present pay, emoluments, and duty, who shall make their returns, through the adjutant and inspector general, to the Secretary of War, as they now do through the surgeon general.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the names and places of residence of the several persons placed upon the pension list under the act of the last session, providing for persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war, made in obedience to a resolution of this House, of the 20th of April last, which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Secretary for the Department of War was instructed, in addition to the report of Revolutionary pensioners, made to this House in pursuance of a resolution of the last session, to designate on the list thereof, the line, corps, or vessel, to which the pensioner belonged, the time of his service, and, if an officer, his rank in the Army or Navy.

Mr. SPENCER called for the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on Thursday, for an inquiry into the conduct of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. LOWNDES suggested to the mover the propriety of deferring the consideration of the resolution a day or two longer, when the House would be in possession of information on the subject which it had not yet received.

Mr. SPENCER not giving way to this suggestion, the question was taken whether the House would now proceed to consider the resolution, and decided in the negative—ayes 62, nays 73.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

NOVEMBER, 1818.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, opened the debate, in opposition to the bill, in a speech which occupied in the delivery the whole of the day's sitting. In the outset, he remarked on the importance of the subject in hand; the interest it had excited, and the feeling it had produced in the old Congress, as well as under the present Government, whenever it had presented itself for consideration. During the existence of the war of the Revolution, some of the documents relating to it had miscarried, and some had been stolen in their transmission; others had been since destroyed by fire, or overlooked in the mass of public papers. Hence the claim had been involved in much mystery, requiring close investigation to unravel it. Mr. P. then proceeded to the examination of the subject, as it had been viewed by the Commissioners of the United States at Paris, by the French Government, and by the claimants. In the course of his argument, he read extracts from letters of Arthur Lee, Benjamin Franklin, and Silas Deane; from the American and French diplomatic volumes; from Gordon's history, and from various other sources. From all these documents, and connecting all the facts disclosed by them together, Mr. P. thought the conclusion irresistible, that the supplies furnished by Caron de Beaumarchais had been a gratuitous aid by the Government of France, and not a private transaction of Beaumarchais. The French Government, which had always disclaimed all expectation of repayment of the aid thus afforded, under the critical circumstances in which it was then placed, Mr. P. contended, had availed itself of the cover of a mercantile transaction, and of the agency of Beaumarchais as the ostensible shipper of supplies; that it had done so, the public disavowal of any agency in this matter was no proof to the contrary, being a part of the policy of concealment which dictated the employment of mercantile agency in the first instance. This claim, therefore, Mr. P. considered as wholly unsustained, and founded on an attempt on the part of Beaumarchais to aggrandize himself and family, by taking advantage of the secret agency in which his name had been employed, and that of the Government and its officers wholly concealed, to claim remuneration from the United States for the supplies sent, as if the matter had been a speculation of his own.

After Mr. P. had concluded his remarks, the Committee rose and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, November 30.

Two other members, to wit: JAMES B. MASON, from Rhode Island, and JOEL ABBOTT, from Georgia, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. GAGE presented a petition of John L. Polereczky, a citizen of the United States, and who was an officer in the French forces in the service of the United States in the Revolutionary war, praying that the benefits of the act passed at the last session of Congress, for the relief of certain persons who served in the land and naval forces of the United States in the Revolutionary war, may be extended to him.—Referred.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to this House on the 2d of March last, in obedience to a resolution instructing him to report, whether any, and if any, what alterations or modifications are required to be made, in the emoluments of officers of the customs, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill in addition to the act of 1799, to regulate the collection of the revenue; [extending the time of taking the oath, to twenty days, in cases of exportation of merchandise entitled to the benefit of drawback;] and a bill for the relief of Denton, Little & Co., and of Harmon Kendricks, of New York; which bills were severally twice read, and committed.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of certain coppersmiths and others, of Boston, which was read and concurred in.

On motion of Mr. HERBERT, it was

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized and directed to contract with any person or persons for the printing of two hundred and fifty copies of the code of jurisprudence for the District of Columbia, prepared and reported to Congress at the present session by the Chief Justice of the said District.

Mr. BUTLER, from the select committee, appointed on that subject, reported a bill for the relief of Major General John Stark, [providing for placing him on the pension list, with a pension of — dollars per month.]

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, the blank was filled with the word sixty, and thus amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, nem. con.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, on sundry petitions for pensions and the increase of pensions, made in compliance with the 3d and 5th sections of the act of 10th April, 1806, which report was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The engrossed bill granting to Mehitable Cole certain lands therein mentioned, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITMAN offered for consideration the following motion:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the propriety of granting pensions to such of the soldiers of the Revolution as served on continental establishment at least one year in the whole, though at different periods of the war, and would have been entitled to the same, by virtue of the act of last session, had they continued in the service uninterruptedly for the term of nine months.

On the question of agreeing to the resolution, it was decided in the negative—ayes 45, noes 69.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to increase the salaries of certain officers of Government," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee on the claim of the representatives of Caron de Beaumarchais.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, rose in support of the claim; and having spoken in defence of it for nearly an hour—

The Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House having agreed now to proceed to the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. SPENCER, of New York, a few days ago, in the words following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inspect the books, and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not, and particularly to report whether the instalments of the capital stock of the said bank have been paid in gold and silver coin, and in the funded debt of the United States, or whether they were, in any instance, and to what amount, paid by the proceeds of the notes of stockholders, discounted for that purpose; and also to report the names of those persons who now own or who have owned any part of the capital stock of the said bank, and the amount of discounts, if any, to such persons respectively, and when made; and also to report whether the said bank, or any of its offices of discount and deposit, have refused to pay the notes of the bank in specie on demand, and have refused to receive, in payment of debts due to them or either of them, the notes of the bank, and whether the bank, or any of its offices of discount, or any of their officers or agents, have sold drafts upon other offices or upon the bank, at an advance, and have received a premium for such drafts; also the amount of the notes issued, payable at Philadelphia, and at each office of discount respectively, and the amount of capital assigned to each office, together with the amount of the public deposits made at the bank and at each office, and an account of the transfers thereof; and the total amount of bills and notes discounted by the bank and its several offices since its organization. That the said committee have leave to meet in the city of Philadelphia, and to remain there as long as may be necessary; that they shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ the requisite clerks, the expense of which shall be audited and allowed by the Committee of Accounts, and paid out of the contingent fund of this House.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said, he had no objection to the object of the proposed inquiry, though he had some objection to the form given to it. He thought it contemplated a wider scope of inquiry than was within the power of Congress. He referred to the act incorporating the bank, and quoted so much of it as reserved to Congress the power to appoint a committee to examine its books, &c., for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the bank has violated its charter. He drew a distinction between this power and that of appointing a committee to inspect the books and proceedings of the bank, for the purpose of reporting to this House and publishing to all the world all its transactions, of whatever nature. The specification of the objects of inquiry was so little necessary to the main object of the resolution, that it would lose nothing of its effect by striking them all out. The inquiry into the amount of discounts to a particular class of individuals, for example, he considered as exceptionable. The right of lending money is vested in the bank, at its discretion, to whomsoever it shall choose. If it have even exercised that power indiscreetly, it is immaterial to this House, with reference to a violation of its charter, (the object of inquiry,) to whom discounts have been made. If the House went so far as was proposed in this respect, it should go further. It should authorize a report to be made of the names of all those who have applied for discounts at the bank, and been refused; and also an inquiry into the character and solvency of all those persons, in order to make that branch of the inquiry effectual. The necessary powers in this respect, Mr. McL. said, the committee of this House would have, under the charter, without a specification of the objects of inquiry; if the committee had not, under the charter, the powers proposed to be given to it, the specification would not confer them. Since, then, the specification was unnecessary, and the resolution, divested of it, would answer every object the gentleman had in view, Mr. McL. moved to amend the resolution, by striking out all that part of it after the words "violated or not," near the beginning, to the word "organization," near the end of it, inclusive. This would leave the inquiry as broad and comprehensive as the nature of the subject would permit, and would divest the resolve of its objectionable features.

Mr. SPENCER opposed the amendment moved by Mr. McLANE. As to the powers of the House, the language of the resolution was that of the charter, respecting the power of inquiry reserved to Congress. The gentleman seemed to suppose that a committee of Congress, appointed for the purpose, might report whether the charter was violated or not, but were not at liberty to report the facts on which that opinion was founded. But, Mr. S. said, when a power is given, the means of carrying that power into execution are also given. If the power were given to inquire whether the charter of the bank had been violated or not, it irresistibly followed that the power was also given to report the facts which had led to that conclusion. But the gentleman objected, that such a report would involve the exposure of private accounts. Mr. S. said he thought he had not examined the resolution with his usual attention; if he would read it again, he would find that no private account whatever was proposed to be examined, except the accounts of the stockholders, so far as to the amount of discounts which they may have received. No inquiry was proposed as to the balance of private individuals' accounts; none as to their deposits; none as to the amount of the debts which they may now owe to the bank, but the aggregate amount of discounts to the individual stockholders since the commencement of the operations of the bank. The resolution does not imply that the stockholders were not justly entitled to the accommodation they have received, nor does it question their solvency; but the particular inquiry objected to is essential, said Mr. S., to enable us to make up our minds whether the bank has acted correctly or not. The object of the resolution, Mr. S. went on to say, did not appear to be precisely understood, perhaps owing to his own neglect not more carefully to explain it. Its object was twofold; to inquire, first, whether there had been a violation of the charter or not; and, secondly, whether improper discounts had not been made to stockholders, &c. The mode of violation of the charter being pointed out in that instrument, needed no more precise definition than that contained in the first clause of the resolve. Then followed, however, in the resolution, other objects of inquiry, regarding the particular instances of alleged misconduct to which the attention of the public has been directed. To accomplish this object another power had been given, to send for persons and papers. It did not follow, because the committee was to report on these particular instances, that the committee was to derive its information from the books of the bank alone. There were other means at their disposal; they might examine papers not belonging to the bank, and persons having personal knowledge of its transactions. An objection had been raised, as he had understood, and to which (though not yet urged in this House) he would advert, that this specification of particular points of inquiry appeared to contain a censure upon the bank, or on the conduct of its officers. It was not so intended, Mr. S. said, nor did he think such an inference could be fairly drawn from the words of the resolve. It embraced some points of inquiry involving no misconduct in their result—that, for example, respecting the refusal of the bank to pay specie for the notes of its branches, &c. There were few who would say that that measure was an evidence of misconduct on the part of the bank, much less that it was a violation of its charter; because such a measure may have been necessary and unavoidable in the present state of the money concerns of the country. The resolution was not intended to convey charges against the bank, but to embrace all the topics respecting which the public mind had been agitated, and to obtain a report thereon from a respectable committee of this House. As to the facts which rendered such an inquiry necessary, it had been suggested that mere general rumor was not a sufficient foundation for this House to act upon. Mr. S. said, he had meant to be understood as having introduced this resolution, not under the influence of general rumor merely, but, as he now stated, he had individual information which left him no doubt of the truth of most of the allegations which he had heard on this subject. With respect to the fact of the payment of the second instalment by discounts to the stockholders, the letter of Mr. Lloyd to a committee of this House, and now on its files, established that fact; and from the circular letters of the cashiers of the bank and its branches, published for information in the public prints, he had evidence of the refusal to pay the notes of the bank or its branches, except where issued. There seemed, therefore, to be sufficient information to authorize an inquiry—sufficient, at least, to induce a belief that there was something to excite the agitation which all knew to exist in the public mind. It had, indeed, appeared to him to be due from him to the House, to state what charges he had heard against the bank, and what were the objects to which he was led to direct the inquiries of the committee. It had appeared to him proper, also, to let the bank and the community know to what objects the inquiry was pointed. He could see no harm from the specific designation of the objects of the inquiry; but, on the contrary, he said, good might be anticipated, for the reasons already stated. With these views he could not assent to the modification proposed, and should feel it to be his duty to vote against it.

Mr. LOWMEYER, of South Carolina, commenced his remarks in favor of the proposed amendment, by saying that he should not vote for it from any apprehension of defect of power in the House to prosecute the inquiry in the terms proposed. He had no doubt of the power of the House, if the public interest required it, to direct a committee to make such a report. He decidedly objected, however, to the specifications proposed to be stricken out, on the ground that, if retained, the inference would follow, that certain allegations were therein embraced, the truth of which being confirmed by inquiry, the censure of Congress if not the penalty due to a violation of the charter, would follow of course. If a committee should be directed to inquire whether the bank has violated its charter, and, particularly, whether it has paid its instalments by discounts, &c., the impression would be made on the mind of every man that the committee had nothing to do but to ascertain these facts, to prove the charter of the bank to have been violated. It did not comport with justice, nor, Mr. L. thought, with the dignity of the House; in a case, too, where the gentleman himself knew the principles involved to be susceptible of much argument and discussion for and against them, to force the public mind, as it were, to the conclusion that, certain facts being proved, the charter of the bank will be proved to have been violated. Therefore, he was in favor of excluding the specifications: With regard to the objects of them, he had no objection whatever to an inquiry on those and all others that might be suggested. The nation, said he, has a deep interest in the conduct and management of the bank; our duty to the people whom we represent, the national interest as owners of a large portion of the stock, its interest in the revenues being wholly payable in the notes of that bank, will justify us in a constant and vigilant attention to its proceedings. If there had been a doubt whether the conduct of the bank had been proper or not, Mr. L. said, the House was fully justified in investigating into the facts, and inquiring whether abuses had been committed or not. Such an investigation he considered at present not only interesting to the public, but necessary to the bank. Many imputations had been thrown on the bank, the result of disappointed expectations, where the expectations themselves had been unreasonable; and it was the interest of the bank that a full inquiry should take place. Recurring to the observation of the effect the specifications in the resolution would have on the public mind, Mr. L. said, while he would therefore exclude them, at the same time voting for any inquiry in its broadest shape, he would remind gentlemen of some circumstances connected with the contents of the resolve. The mover of it had himself referred to a report made by a committee of this House appointed to inquire into the subject of the payment of the second instalment on the stock of the bank by discounts—a report made at a time when, if that course had been wrong, it was in the power of Congress to have prevented it. The fact of a general regulation having been adopted for discounting notes for payment of the second instalment, was acknowledged to the committee, who yet reported to this House a recommendation that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. L. said he would not now enter into an investigation of the conduct of the bank on that occasion; his impression at the time had been, that the arrangement was beneficial to the community, by facilitating and expediting the organization of the bank, &c.; but that it was an imprudent one, on the part of the directors of that institution, whose object it should be to adhere to the very line of their duty, as pointed out by the charter. The point, however, to which he desired to call the attention of the House, was, that when the corrective and remedy were in their hands, if the act was wrong, a committee having been instructed to inquire into it, and having reported the fact, the House had not thought proper to interfere at all in the business. Under these circumstances, said he, it would be harsh indeed, at this late hour, availing ourselves of the new lights which experience has afforded us, to censure the bank for having done that to which, at the time, we tacitly consented. A distinction, of course, must be drawn between the second and third instalments, in regard to the mode of payment; the payment of the latter by notes, discounted for that purpose, everybody anticipated. The bank was then in full operation, discounting all good paper offered to it, and could not be expected to pass a law of exclusion in regard to its own stockholders, who had as fair a claim at least as others to accommodation; indeed, there never perhaps had gone a bank into operation in which the same thing had not occurred; it was therefore expected of the Bank of the United States in regard to the third instalment on its stock, and could not be considered as forming a ground of complaint against it. Another specific object of the inquiry was, whether the bank or its branches had sold drafts and received a premium thereon. The gentleman from New York had stated, with great candor, as he understood him, that he did not consider it an imputation on the bank that it had refused to pay specie for its notes at any other branch than that from which they issued; and that he therefore did not mean to contend that the bank ought to have made its paper and that of its branches payable indifferently at the bank or at any and all of its branches. Connected very closely with this subject, Mr. L. said, was the practice of selling drafts on distant banks for a premium. He knew, he said, that much of the disapprobation of the conduct of the bank proceeded from the disappointment of an expectation that it would emit and sustain a currency which should be of equal value throughout the Union; and, it might be of some importance, as many of the members of the present Congress were not members of the last, to advert to circumstances which proved that the expectation referred to was never entertained in this House at the time the bank was incorporated. The Congress which preceded that by which the bank was established, Mr. L. said, had had under its consideration a bill for establishing a bank, one clause of which did provide that the bank and all its branches should be obliged to pay the notes of each other; by which means, if practicable, the paper of all would have been everywhere of an equal value. That clause, however, was not inserted in the bill which actually passed. If there were no other, this would be sufficient proof, from the records of the House, that it was not expected that a currency that should be everywhere of equal value would be established. But, further: in the act incorporating the bank, there is a provision that the bank shall charge nothing to the Government for difference of exchange. Was this not, Mr. L. asked, positive proof that it was expected that the bank would charge in some cases the difference of exchange? Was it not proof that it was the expectation of the framers of the law that the present state of things would result? He would not enter at all into the general question whether it would or would not be possible for the Bank of the United States to equalize, without great loss, the exchange between different sections of the country, if by their charter they were bound to do so. If it were practicable, it would be even now their interest to do it; but, Mr. L. said, he believed it would be wholly impracticable. The question was not, however, whether it was possible for the United States to effect it, whether it would be beneficial to the country or to the institution, but whether the bank was bound to effect the object. The exclusion of the clause having this object, after it had been included in a like bill before Congress, at the preceding session, and, in addition, the express exception of the Government from all charge for difference of exchange, showed that it was not expected of the bank. If, however, he were to go into the discussion of the practicability of establishing a circulating medium of equal value in every part of the country, it would appear not only that in the reason of the thing it was not practicable, but experience also would show that in a large empire it is visionary to look for it. Even in England, as gentlemen well knew, when the bank paid in specie, the value of a bank note in different parts of the country was not the same. There was a settled rate of exchange between Edinburgh and London, and between all the important towns in Great Britain; and the Bank of England, with every advantage, improved by an hundred years of experience, had never been able to accomplish that object. The inquiry, however, was not whether the object was practicable or possible, but whether the bank was bound to effect it; and he had shown that it was not. Objections of a similar nature might be urged to most of the specifications in the resolve; but it was sufficient to say that, if necessary, the committee, under the general terms of inquiry, would feel themselves at liberty to inquire and report on any of the points in question; that no additional power could be conferred on the committee by descending to particulars; and that to retain the specification might produce an impression that the House had determined certain facts, if proved, to be conclusive against the bank, whilst the House had, in fact, expressed no opinion upon them. There was another objection, of a different kind, to the terms of the resolve as it now stood: that it specified certain objects, to which it in a manner thus limited the proposed inquiry, whilst, in his opinion, there were many facts not referred to, equally if not more important to the bank, and to the public interests, than those which were. Without justifying or censuring the conduct of the bank, without expressing, in a parenthesis, or by insinuation, an opinion unfavorable to it, Mr. L. said he thought it would be proper to institute a committee of inquiry, and leave them, on their own responsibility, to settle the principles on which they should proceed in it, and to report accordingly. He was in favor of leaving the committee wholly unfettered, except by their own opinion of what was required by the public good; and therefore hoped the amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER again rose. He took a different view of his own motion from that which had been taken by the gentleman who had preceded him. The first branch of it embraced a distinct substantive object of inquiry, whether the bank has violated its charter. The resolution then recited other objects of inquiry, on which information was desirable, by which the House might be induced to exercise or refrain from exercising its discretion of requesting a removal of the directors on the part of the United States, &c. After denying that the enumeration of objects limited the range of inquiry to the committee, Mr. S. proceeded to notice the observation of Mr. LOWNDES, that he (Mr. S.) had admitted that the bank was not censurable, perhaps, in the present state of the currency, for not paying specie for the notes of its branches, &c. I might have proceeded, said Mr. S., and perhaps ought to have remarked, that it was a proper subject of inquiry, how far the state of the currency referred to has been produced by the bank itself. So far as he had understood, Mr. S. said, at the time the bank was chartered, loud complaints were made against the State banks, that they had issued a large amount of notes without a specie basis, which had of course ceased to circulate out of their immediate vicinity, except at a great rate of depreciation. This institution was established to remedy the evil, and was founded on a basis of specie and of public debt, so solid that it was supposed it would never be distressed for the means of paying its own notes, but would be always able to sustain the currency as well as the credit of the country. But, instead of correcting the evil, the bank had pursued the same course (as he understood it) as the State banks, and made things worse than they were. Instead of gold and silver, and public debt, it had received, in payment of its instalments, the credit of individuals as the basis on which to issue its notes and carry on its operations. How far, therefore, the present state of the currency was attributable to this institution itself, Mr. S. said he was not prepared to answer. He wished for facts to enable him to decide. Whatever, Mr. S. further said, had been the expectation in Congress at the time of passing the bank law respecting the establishment by it of an uniform national currency, the fact was otherwise with the public; and it became proper for him to show on what grounds the public expectation rested. The first document on the subject to which he referred was the Message of President Madison to Congress, of December 5, 1815, in which the establishment of a bank was suggested as the means of restoring the currency of the country from its disordered state; and, next, he referred to the annual report of Mr. Secretary Dallas, about the same period, wherein he proposed the establishment of a National Bank, as the means of establishing an uniform national currency. With these inducements before them, Congress had passed the law, and it was not without reason the public expected, from what had been predicted of it out of Congress, if not on this floor, that the bank would be the means of establishing an uniform national currency. He had, however, been informed by many who were members of Congress, that the only consideration which had induced them to vote for the bill for establishing the bank, was, that it was expected to restore an uniform national currency. Thus much, Mr. S. said, he thought necessary to state, to justify that part of the inquiry which relates to the fact of the bank's having refused to redeem with specie the notes of its branches, &c. Because, if the fact were so, the committee would inquire whether it was owing to causes not within the control of the bank, or to the misconduct of the latter. This inquiry, he said, was properly embraced in the resolution, although it did not go to establish the fact of a violation of the charter of the bank. There were remedies in the power of the Government to correct any misconduct short of a violation of its charter on the part of the bank: it was in the power of Congress to request the removal of the directors; to direct the deposits of the Government to be withdrawn from the bank, or to declare that the notes of the bank should no longer be received in payment of duties. There was therefore abundant reason for inquiry into any particular misconduct of the bank, though it should not amount to a violation of its charter.

Mr. LOWNDES made a few other remarks in favor of the amendment; among which was this: that he could not conceive what greater power any committee could desire over a bank than a carte blanche to examine into its whole proceedings.

The question having been taken on the proposed amendment, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 64.

Mr. LOWNDES, then, to make the inquiry as comprehensive as possible, moved to insert, after the words "Bank of the United States," the words "to report thereon."

Mr. SPENCER suggested a different amendment, for directing the committee also to inquire into the instances of misconduct on the part of the directors of the bank, or of any of its offices of discount and deposit.

Mr. LOWNDES said he preferred his own motion, since that of Mr. S. would convey an imputation on the conduct of the directors, when it was only the object of the House to inquire what that conduct had been.

The amendment of Mr. LOWNDES was adopted.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, moved to strike out so much of the resolution, as amended, as gives leave to the committee to meet in the city of Philadelphia; which, it appeared to him, was not necessary to retain. With respect to an inspection of the books of the bank, if the necessary books could not be brought here, he should suppose the House might safely rely on transcripts made by the officers of the bank, under the inspection of the directors generally, of whom five were appointed by the United States. He would not say that he would refuse to agree to such a proposition, if he was convinced it was absolutely necessary; but, until he was, he thought it would comport better with the usual manner of proceeding in the Congress of the United States, to have a transcript from the books brought here, rather than that the committee should travel to where the books are.

Mr. TERRY, of Connecticut, hoped that the motion would not be agreed to, as it would defeat the object of the resolution. In the first place, the books were not in the keeping of the directors—they have a right to inspect the books, but they are in the keeping of the cashier. The books, he said could not be brought here, because they were wanted every day and every hour. As to making transcripts of the books, that, he said, would indeed be a Herculean task. It would be impossible to make the transcript within a reasonable time. It would, besides, be imposing a hardship on the Bank of the United States, to send its books here, and keep them here the necessary time, so long almost wholly interrupting the business of the bank. He thought the object of the resolve could not be attained so readily in any other way as by an inspection of the books; for which purpose, it appeared to him absolutely necessary that the committee should go to Philadelphia.

Mr. SPENCER considered the part proposed to be stricken out as of the essence of the resolution. It amounted after all, only to a leave to the committee to go to Philadelphia if they should think it necessary. Since an inspection of the books of the bank was the object of the resolve, the question which presented itself was, whether it was better to bring the books here, or go to the books. If they were brought hither, independent of the consequent suspension of the business of the bank, the labor of the committee would be unusually increased by the confusion in which they must be brought, and the difficulty of afterwards arranging them. In regard to transcripts, the great labor of making them out of the question, it seemed hardly fair to call on the gentlemen implicated for the evidence of their own condemnation. How far others would be satisfied, said Mr. S. I know not—but, for myself, I should not be satisfied with any transcript from the books; not that I would impeach the integrity of those who would have to make them, but that it will take so long as to defeat the inquiry altogether. It was due to the bank, as well as to the nation, that the inquiry should be so conducted, as that there should be no pretence for any doubt of the entire correctness of the facts which the committee should report.

Mr. LOWNDES said, if there was to be an inspection of the books of the bank at all, it could only take place where the books were. He wished, for his part, that the investigation should be as close as possible, that no doubt should possibly be left on the subject upon the mind of any one. He had no objection that the committee should go not only to Philadelphia, but that they should afterwards repair to the different places, in succession, where branches were established. He had no objection, therefore, to giving all necessary powers; but he wished to give no more power than was necessary, and should have preferred withholding the leave to go to Philadelphia until the committee, finding it necessary, in the course of their investigation, should ask for it. This, he believed, had been the usual course in every case heretofore in which such powers had been granted. He should, therefore, vote for the amendment, with the determination, if the committee should, in the progress of their inquiry, think it necessary to go to Philadelphia, to vote for granting to them the necessary leave.

Mr. SPENCER demanded the yeas and nays on this motion. Unless the committee had adequate powers to obtain the object in view, the resolution was mere waste paper. What means would they have here of detecting deception, if any were attempted? How could they tell any better than they could now whether the measures of the bank were correct or not? It seemed, from the very nature of the inquiry, that personal inspection was necessary; and it was the mode of inquiry which the charter itself seemed to have contemplated.

On the question on Mr. BARBOUR's motion, to strike out the leave to repair to Philadelphia, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

The question was then taken on the resolution as amended, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, to report thereon, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not; that the said committee have leave to meet in the city of Philadelphia, and remain there as long as may be necessary; that they shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ the requisite clerks; the expense of which shall be audited and allowed by the Committee of Accounts, and paid out of the contingent fund of this House.

And it was passed in the affirmative.

Messrs. SPENCER, LOWNDES, McLANE, BRYAN, and TYLER, were appointed the said committee.

TUESDAY, December 1.

Mr. MIDDLETON presented the petition of the Marquis de Vienne, stating, that he served as a Colonel in the service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war; that he was then rich and refused to receive any compensation, but that, having been reduced to poverty by the revolutions in France, he is now compelled to seek a remuneration for his said services, from Congress, and praying to be paid such sum as may be thought a just equivalent therefor; which petition was referred to a select committee; and Mr. MIDDLETON, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. COLSTON, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the emigration and settlement of the Choctaw tribe of Indians on the lands of the United States, west of the river Mississippi, until they shall have acquired that right by treaty, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. P. reported a bill to prohibit the Choctaw tribe of Indians from settling or hunting on the lands of the United States, west of the Mississippi, which was read twice, and committed.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the act, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled an act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. FOLGER, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to William Coffin and others, owners of the brig Bonif, a drawback of the duties on a quantity of whale oil imported from Patagonia and Brazil, in said brig, in the month of June, 1817, and which has since been exported out of the United States.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the salary of certain officers of Government," was read twice, and committed.

MIGRATION OF SLAVES.

Mr. LINN, of New Jersey, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the unlawful introduction of slaves into the United States, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law prohibiting the migration or transportation of slaves or servants of color from any State to any other part of the United States, in cases where, by the laws of such State, such transportation is prohibited; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise."

Mr. LINN said, in introducing his resolution, that it related to a subject of much interest in his part of the country, and, as the resolution only proposed an inquiry, he hoped it would not be objected to.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, objected to it. Any man, he said, had a right to remove his property from one State to another, and slaves as well as any other property, if not prohibited from doing so by the State laws. With those laws, whatever they were, the United States, he said had no right to interfere. The idea was a perfectly novel one, that there should be a double set of penal statutes on the same subject—one set by the States, and one by the United States—and that the military force of the United States should be employed to carry into effect the penal statute of any State. How were the United States to interfere on this subject? What judicial tribunal would they resort to, to effect the object contemplated? Any penal statute they could pass on the subject, Mr. P. said, would be entirely nugatory, as it could not be carried into effect; and he was therefore opposed even to an inquiry into the matter.

Mr. COLSTON, of Virginia, in addition to what had fallen from Mr. POINDEXTER in opposition to the resolution, suggested that it was perfectly within the power of the State sovereignties to execute any law they might enact on this subject, more effectually than they could do by the aid of the authority of the United States.

The question on the passage of the resolve was then taken, and decided in the negative.

GENERAL JOHN STARK.

The bill for granting a pension of sixty dollars per month to Major General John Stark, was read a third time.

On the question, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. W. P. MACLAY asked for information of the committee who reported the bill, as no written report had accompanied it, on what grounds it stood; whether the pension was granted because of indigence on the part of General Stark, or for what other reason?

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, said he must join his voice to that of his friend from Pennsylvania. He knew not, from anything that appeared, what were the claims of General Stark, nor that he stood in need of a pension. Why was he selected, from among the many surviving officers of the Revolution, to receive a pension of this amount? He hoped the reason would be explained—or, though with reluctance, he must vote against the bill.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, said his friend from Georgia could not have been present when this subject was before the House at the last session, or he would not have asked the information which he now desired. He had supposed his friend from Georgia was better acquainted with the history of his country, than not to know the merits and distinguished Revolutionary services of this hoary veteran. At the darkest period of the Revolution, General Stark had rendered the most important services to his country; and those services were not occasional, but were prolonged to the close of the contest. It was now said that this worthy was in indigent circumstances, and debilitated by old age; that, if not soon bestowed, he would not live to enjoy the aid about to be afforded to him. Was it possible, Mr. H. asked, that an American Congress could behold so distinguished a patriot, as he is, sinking into the grave in the want of every necessary of life, or that they would coldly place him among the mass of pensioners under the general act of last session? For his part, he would give out the last dollar in the Treasury for the relief of General

Stark. With him, he said, it was not a matter of choice to vote for the bill; it was an imperious duty.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, that as a member of this House, and as a citizen of New Hampshire, he was grateful to the gentleman from Ohio for the manner in which he had expressed himself on this occasion. He would only add that, as to the circumstances of General Stark, they were, to his personal knowledge, very reduced. He was, as to personal exertion for his support, at the age of ninety years, wholly helpless. He might or might not be owner of a small farm; but, if so, it was an unproductive one. He was, and had been for some time, dependent for support on his children, themselves in very moderate circumstances. This was the true situation of General Stark.

Mr. COBB said, if it was true, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, that he was not well versed in the Revolutionary history, should he want information on that head, he should know where to apply; for the gentleman himself was a living chronicle of the occurrences of that day. He did not, he said, doubt the merits of General Stark; but he had yet no evidence that the pension ought to be granted. The House had been told he was very old and infirm. But, if the House were to grant pensions to the old and infirm, where would they draw the line at which they would stop? Are we to be told, said he, that it is to Revolutionary officers only that pensions are to be granted? Some twenty or forty years hence, may not the same argument, by the aid of this precedent, be applied to General Jackson, General Brown, General Scott, or any other general who distinguished himself during the late war? He was free to say, for himself, that he thought the pension list had already been swelled to an amount which absolutely jeopardized the Treasury, or soon would, at the rate at which it still increased. General Stark had become poor, whether by his misfortune or his misconduct, he had not heard; but, if he had been so long supported without the aid of Government, he had no doubt he could be for the remainder of his life. He had yet heard no reason to induce him to vote for this pension.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, if the gentleman meant to insinuate that General Stark had been brought to poverty by intemperance, or by fault of any kind, he was wholly mistaken; the fact was not so. General Stark had worn himself out in the service of his country, in his youth, and had since supported himself as well as he could. He was in service before the Revolution, and during that trial he did the nation great service and himself great honor. At an early period of the Revolution, when every patriot was called a traitor, Stark was in the foremost rank. He was in the field at Bennington, and animated the courage of others by his conduct and example. All the inhabitants of New Hampshire, and of the Green Mountains, flocked where Stark was; where he fought, they fought and bled; had he died, they would have died with him.

H. or R.

DECEMBER, 1818.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, gave some further information respecting General Stark. He was, he said, the only surviving general officer of the Revolution, now declining in old age, extremely poor, and long supported by his sons, who were not very well able to do it. This, Mr. B. said, might be the last opportunity Congress could have of contributing to the relief of his wants. As a precedent had been demanded, Mr. B. quoted the pension granted at the last session to General St. Clair as directly in point. General Stark, he added, had served during the whole French war, and no man had afterwards done more than him to assert and establish the independence of his country.

Mr. COBB explained, that he did not mean to suggest that General Stark was intemperate, but merely to state his ignorance of the fact, whether his present poverty had been owing to his fault or misfortune.

The question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative, without division.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

The remainder of the day's sitting was spent in Committee of the Whole, on the claim of the heirs of Beaumarchais.

Mr. BALDWIN concluded his speech in support of the justice of this claim, and the expediency of the Government's paying it.

Mr. COLSTON spoke for about half an hour against the claim.

When the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, December 2.

Another member, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JOSEPH HEISTER, appeared and took his seat.

A new member, to wit: from North Carolina, WILLIAM DAVIDSON, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Daniel M. Forney, also appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred an inquiry into the expediency of repealing the duty on imported salt, made a report adverse to the expediency of the abolition of the duty, which was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the establishment of a national armory on the western waters; and the bill for the relief of Joseph Wheaton; which were severally twice read and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of the appropriations proposed for the service of the year 1819; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter addressed to him by Edward De Krafft, printer for Congress, remonstrating against the alleged violation of his contract with the Clerk to do all the printing ordered by the House, by the resolution of the 30th ultimo, directing the printing by contract of the code of laws prepared for the District, and claiming said printing as matter of right; which letter was read and ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the act passed at the last session, entitled "An act to suspend for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payments thereon;" and also to inquire what further relief it may be proper to give to the persons who are indebted to the United States for the purchase of lands.

In support of the inquiry, Mr. H. briefly referred to the difficulty which at present existed in Ohio, in making payments for land in the kind of money required by the Treasury Department, which, from the suspension of specie payments by the banks of Ohio, was now very limited, the notes of all such banks being refused, and the consequent necessity of extending the indulgence mentioned in his resolution. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN, of North Carolina, asked and obtained permission of the House to be excused from serving on the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of the Bank of the United States. Mr. B. stated, that, in asking this indulgence, he was not actuated by a desire to shrink from the important duty assigned him, but that he was a stockholder of the institution, and, as such, conceived that delicacy forbade his being one of those appointed to make the investigation ordered by the House—an investigation, upon the result of which the future character and prospects of the institution would mainly depend. [Mr. BURWELL was appointed in Mr. BRYAN's place.]

On motion by Mr. TALLMADGE, the Committee on Naval Affairs were directed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the amount of the security to be hereafter required from Navy Agents, and also of requiring security to a greater amount from those now in office.

On motion of Mr. SIMKINS, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation of such postmasters as are on the main post route from Washington City, by Augusta, in Georgia, to New Orleans, where there are cross mails, and whose compensations do not exceed a certain sum.

Mr. S. justified the proposed inquiry by advertising to the unremitting and onerous duties required of certain postmasters, on the main southern post route, and the small and inadequate compensation at present afforded by their emoluments.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the resolution "authorizing the transmission of certain documents free of postage;" with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendment was read, and concurred in.

DECEMBER, 1818.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais.

Mr. HOPKINSON occupied the floor in a speech of about an hour, in opposition to the claim of the petitioners; and

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina:

Ordered, That all petitions presented to the House and committed at the last session, from the consideration of which, without having decided on them, for the want of time, the several committees to which they were referred were discharged, be considered as again referred to the said committees, respectively, on the suggestion of any member to the Clerk of the House.

Mr. COBB presented a petition of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, on behalf of Lachlan McIntosh, junior, William Dennis, Stephen Heard, John Donaldson, Joseph Martin, John Sevier, and Thomas Carr, commissioners appointed by the State of Georgia, in virtue of a resolution of the General Assembly of that State, of the 20th of February, 1784, for surveying the lands lying on the Big Bend of Tennessee river, or their heirs or representatives, praying that the lands to which the commissioners aforesaid were entitled for their services in making said survey, and promised by the said resolution, may now be granted to such of the said commissioners as are living, and to the heirs or representatives of such as are deceased; which memorial was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. CLAIBORNE, COBB, HOGG, SETTLE, and CRAWFORD, were appointed the said committee.

Ordered, That the report made by a select committee at the last session, (10th of February, 1818,) on the petitions of General Andrew Jackson, Thomas Carr, and George W. Sevier, and others, and the bill for the relief of the said Thomas Carr, and others, together with the petitions aforesaid, be referred to the committee last appointed.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to lay before this House a statement of the sales of the public lands in the Alabama Territory, at public and private sale, specifying the date of such sales, and the period at which the last payment will become due; and also the aggregate amount of money paid to the receiver of public moneys at Huntsville, in the said Territory; and the description of bank paper, if any, which is receivable there in payment of the public lands.

On motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what provision ought to be made by law to authorize the emanation of patents to soldiers on furlough at the close of the war, and to whom discharges were not issued in consequence of their not being ordered to join their respective regiments.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:
I transmit to the House of Representatives copies of such documents referred to in the Message of the 17th ultimo, as have been prepared since that period. They present a full view of the operations of our troops employed in the Seminole war, who entered Florida.

The residue of the documents, which are very voluminous, will be transmitted as soon as they can be prepared.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 2, 1818.

The Message was read, and, together with the documents, ordered to lie on the table.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee favorable to the claim of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais.

Mr. SPENCER spoke at large in support of the report of the committee.

Mr. STORRS followed on the opposite side of the question.

Mr. BALDWIN again addressed the committee in support of the claim, and Mr. PITKIN in opposition to it.

When the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, December 4.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, TIMOTHY FULLER, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. JOHN McLEAN appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat as the Representative of the State of Illinois in this House.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of John Clarke, an officer in the Revolutionary Army, praying compensation for his services in the capacity aforesaid, as, also, for property lost in the public service.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making a partial appropriation for the military service of the United States for the year 1819, and to make good a deficit in the appropriation for holding treaties with the Indians; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of Philip C. S. Barbour, accompanied by a bill for his relief; also, a general report on sundry petitions, for confirmation of certain land claims derived from the French and Spanish Governments, accompanied by a bill "for the final adjustment of certain land claims in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri," which were twice read, the first committed, and the second laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and adjust the accounts of John Smith, and the legal representatives of Ambrose D. Smith, and for supplies furnished to the Army of the United States, during the late war with Great Britain, on principles of equity and justice.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill reported by the select committee for the relief of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais.

Mr. TALLMADGE resumed the debate on this subject, and spoke about an hour in opposition to the claim and the bill. He was followed by Mr. BASSETT, in a speech of about the same length, in support of the claim, and in defence of the report of the committee thereon.

Mr. BALDWIN added some remarks on the same side, and in reply to gentlemen who had opposed the claim; after which, the Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment to the House; when the question was taken whether the bill should be engrossed and read a third time, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Ball, Bassett, Bellinger, Butler of Louisiana, Cobb, Cruger, Ervin of South Carolina, Garnett, Harrison, Holmes, Hostetter, Irving of New York, Johnson of Virginia, McLean of Illinois, W. Maclay, W. P. Mac-lay, Middleton, Samuel Moore, Murray, T. M. Nelson, Ogle, Owen, Poindexter, Robertson, Ballard Smith, Spencer, Tyler, Walker of Kentucky, and Wilson of Pennsylvania—31.

Smith, Alexan-der Smith, J. S. Smith, Southard, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Strother, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Terrell, Terry, Tompkins, Townsend, Trimble, Tucker of South Carolina, Upham, Walker of North Carolina, Wallace, Wendover, Westerlo, Whiteside, Whitman, Wilkin, Williams of Connecticut, Williams of New York, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of Massachusetts—123.

And so the said bill was rejected. The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 7.

Two other members, to wit: from Maryland, SAMUEL RINGGOLD, and from Ohio, PETER HITCH-cock, appeared, and took their seats.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Alabama Territory, accompanied with a census of the inhabitants of said Territory; praying that the said Territory may be admitted into the Union as a State; which petition was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. POIN-DEXTER, CLAIBORNE, COBB, ORR, and BUTLER of New Hampshire, were appointed the said committee.

The SPEAKER also presented another petition from the Legislative Council and House of Rep-resentatives of the Alabama Territory, praying for certain alterations in the judicial system of the said Territory; which petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN, of Illinois, presented a petition of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, stating that previous to the survey of the public lands in the district of Shawneetown, several persons settled on public lands, which, since the survey, have been discovered to be the section No. 16, reserved for the use of schools; and praying that other lands may be assigned for the use of schools in such cases.

Mr. McLEAN presented another petition of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, pray-ing for a donation of four sections of land for the purpose of establishing thereon the seat of the government of the said State, for twenty years.—Referred to the Committee on the Pub-lic Lands.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee of Elec-tions, made the following report:

The Committee of Elections have examined the certificate of election of John McLean, who is re-turned a Representative of the State of Illinois, and find the same sufficient to entitle him to a seat in this House.

JOHN W. TAYLOR, Chairman.

DECEMBER 7, 1818.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the ap-plication of Jacob Dox, for compensation for his services as a commissioner on behalf of the Uni-tered States in taking evidence on the Niagara frontier, in relation to claims against the United States, which report was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill for the relief of said Jacob Dox, which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Com-mittee on Military Affairs, reported a bill concerning widows and orphans; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted to the House a letter addressed to him as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, from the Secretary of War, upon the subject of the establishment of an ad-ditional armory, which was referred to the Com-mittee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill authorizing the establishment of a national armory.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the Judiciary Committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, that the ses-sions of the circuit and district courts of the Uni-tered States, for the district of Ohio, be held alter-nately in the city of Cincinnati, and at such other place as now is, or may hereafter be, ap-pointed by law, for holding the same.

On motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of re-pealing an act passed March 3, 1814, entitled "An act to establish the districts of Mumphyre-magog, of Oswegatchie, and of the White Mountains."

Mr. L. observed, in explanation, that these dis-tricts were established during the embargo, and continued to be necessary during the war which followed; but that now, in time of peace, they were entirely useless, and as they involved an expense of about $1,200, without being neces-sary, it was expedient they should be discon-tinued.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee on Private Land Claims were instructed to in-quire into the expediency of authorizing the register of the land office and receiver of public moneys, west of Pearl river, in the State of Mississippi, to receive additional evidence in the claim to land of the legal representatives of Al-exander Montgomery, deceased, founded on a warrant of survey, from the Spanish Govern-ment, granted to John Montgomery, and report-ed to the Secretary of the Treasury, according to law.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, twenty-five hun-dred additional copies of the Message of the President of the United States, in relation to the Seminole war, communicated to this House on the 3d instant, and the documents accompanying the same, were ordered to be printed for the use of the members of this House.

On motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, the President of the United States was requested to cause to be laid before the House of Representatives, the proceedings which have been had under the act, entitled, "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States;" specifying the num-ber of ships which have been put on the stocks, and of what class, and the quantity, and kind of materials which have been procured in compli-ance with the provisions of said act; and also the sums of money which have been paid out of the fund created by said act, and for what ob-jects; and likewise the contracts which have been entered into in execution of the said act, on which moneys may not yet have been ad-vanced.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to each State a tract of land, not exceeding one hundred thousand acres, for the endowment of an university in each State.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from John Gardiner, enclosing a map of the Ala-bama Territory, and of military bounty lands in Missouri, and stating that if Congress thinks proper to give to each soldier a map with his bounty land, he is willing to relinquish his im-pression on reasonable terms; which letter was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The House then resolved itself into a Com-mittee of the Whole, on the bill making a par-tial appropriation for the Military Establishment, &c.; which was reported to the House without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Wil-liam Barton; on the bill for the relief of Wil-liam King; and on the bill for the relief of the heirs of Adolphus Burghart, deceased; which were reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and severally read a third time to-morrow.

PETITION OF JOHN HAILE.

The House then resolved itself into a Commit-tee of the Whole, on the report of the Commit-tee of Claims on the petition of John Haile.

The petitioner in this case states that, in the month of December, 1814, the enemy entered the town of Tappahannock, and, in consequence of his house being used and occupied as a cus-tom-house, in which the public records were kept, set fire to and destroyed the same, with its contents. The petitioner further states, that, al-though the house was his own property, it was evident the enemy destroyed it in consequence of its being used as a public office, and he therefore prays Congress to grant him remuneration. The Committee report, as their opinion, that the pe-titioner cannot, under the law of April, 1816, or under any other law with which they are ac-quainted, be entitled to relief.

The report was opposed by Mr. GARNETT, on the ground that this property, being in the occu-pation of the Government, stood on the same foot-ing as property occupied in the military service of the United States, and for that reason destroyed. This position he sustained at some length. Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, defended the re-port, contending that, as the property was placed in the situation in which it stood, by the act of the individual, (who received from the Govern-ment a good salary for his services,) and not at the requisition of the Government, he had no manner of claim on the Government for relief.

The report was agreed to by the Committee, and, being reported to the House, was there concurred in. So the prayer of the petitioner was rejected.

SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SIMKINS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to lay before this House a statement of the sales, public and private, of public lands northwest of the Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river; the respective years in which such sales have taken place, the credits given on such sales, the sums which have been paid thereon, those which are now due, and the periods at which they became so; whether any instalments are yet to fall due, and to what amount; also what descriptions of paper have been received, and what are now receivable in payment for said lands.

On the suggestion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the motion was modified by striking out the words in italic, so as to make the scope of it embrace all the country northwest of the Ohio.

Some discussion then took place on the expediency of adopting the resolution; in which Mr. STROTHER objected to it, on the ground that much of it was anticipated by information heretofore communicated, or required by the House; that it embraced an extent of information which was unnecessary, and to afford which, would demand of the Treasury Department a labor perfectly herculean, &c.

Mr. HARRISON, under an idea that much of the information called for was already communicated in the annual reports from the Treasury, and unwilling to order such a laborious and extensive mass of information precipitately, moved that the resolution lie on the table and be printed; which being acquiesced in by Mr. SIMPKINS, whose object was not to give unnecessary trouble, but only to obtain information not already communicated;

The resolution was laid on the table.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the petition of William Jackson, solicitor for the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, and to which were referred sundry petitions of said officers, and of inhabitants of the United States on their behalf, made a detailed report upon said petitions; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That, on the 21st of October, 1780, by resolution of Congress, it was provided that the officers who should continue in service to the end of the war, should be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the time of reduction. This stipulation emanated from a previous resolution of Congress, which promised seven years' half pay to the same class of officers, excepting those who might hold any office of profit under the United States, or any of the States.

By another resolution of Congress, in January, 1781, the stipulation was so extended as to embrace the hospital department and medical staff. In the beginning of the year 1783 a memorial was presented to Congress, from a committee of the officers of the Army under the immediate command of General Washington, proposing a relinquishment of the half pay for life, on condition that an equivalent should be provided, either by the payment of a gross sum or by a full compensation for a limited time. This proposition, which originated with officers of the army, grew out of a conviction that the half pay for life was regarded by their fellow-citizens as savoring too much of the spirit of a privileged order, which rendered the measure unpopular with many of the community; and the proposition, on the part of the officers, to relinquish the payment for life, was, and ever will be, viewed as an act of the most distinguished patriotism, in perfect accordance with that entire devotion to the country, which is so strikingly manifested in all their sufferings, sacrifices, and services.

Congress, well apprized of the prevailing objection to the allowance for life, which had been adopted only from necessity, readily embraced the occasion of removing a measure objectionable in its principle, by a commutation of five years' full pay in lieu of the half pay for life, in a resolution of March 22d, 1783, which provided that such officers as were then in service, and should continue therein to the end of the war, should be entitled to receive the amount of five years' full pay in money, or securities on interest, at six per cent. per annum, as Congress should find most convenient, instead of the half pay promised for life by the resolution of October 21st, 1780; the said securities to be such as should be given to other creditors of the United States, provided it should be at the option of the lines of the respective States, and not of officers individually of those lines, to refuse or accept the same. The commutation was acceded to by the officers generally, in the manner pointed out; and at the reduction of the Army they received commutation certificates for the amount prescribed. The memorialists state a variety of facts, and present many considerations, to prove that, by the commutation, great injustice has been done to the officers originally entitled to half pay for life, and their object is to induce the Government to resume the original contract of half pay for life upon certain terms therein expressed; and the memorial concludes with a specific prayer, that an act may be passed directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the claim of each surviving officer of the Revolutionary Army of the United States, who by the resolves of Congress was entitled to half pay for life, calculating the amount of the principal of the arrearages from the time of his reduction, and deducting therefrom five years' full pay; and the balance of arrearages being thus ascertained, to issue a certificate, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, to the officer for the amount of said balance; and the officer to be thenceforth entitled to receive half pay, in half yearly payments, for and during the term of his natural life. The committee have endeavored to investigate the subject with all the candor and attention which its merits require; and in any point of view difficulties of no ordinary magnitude presented themselves.

When contemplating the eminent services and generous sacrifices of that illustrious band, the committee could not withhold a favorable report to the full extent of the prayer of the petitioners, could they be governed alone by feeling. The resources of the nation would never repay the debt of gratitude which is due to the patriots and sages of the Revolution, whose counsels and achievements so essentially contributed to the establishment of that freedom and independence from which so many blessings flow. Was the prayer of the petitioners asked as a gratuity only, new difficulties would arise: other classes of citizens, equally meritorious and much more numerous, whose sacrifices were not less extensive, would have equal claims, and merit equal attention. The whole Revolutionary struggle was marked with public sacrifices and public devotion; every class of citizens endured with cheerfulness the privations and losses to which those trying times subjected them, and in the happiness and independence of the country which followed every member of the community found its best reward; and however desirable it may be that every sacrifice, in time of great public calamity, may receive a pecuniary requital, the American Revolution demonstrates its impracticability, and necessity requires that the munificence of Government should have some limitation. Well aware of this view of the subject, the claim of the memorialists is predicated upon contract and legal obligation. In the light of justice, therefore, the committee have also considered this subject; and it is with feelings of extreme regret they find themselves compelled, in duty, to differ in opinion with the memorialists in the prayer of the petition.

The resolution of Congress, under which the claim for the half pay was commuted, was proposed by the officers, and the commutation voluntarily accepted by them in the manner specified. The memorialists also urge their claim upon the supposition that the commutation was not an equivalent for the original stipulation, that more than five years' full pay was then equitably due. The committee, on this point, are of opinion, that a just estimate was made by the parties when the commutation was agreed upon, under all the circumstances of the case, and ought not to be revised at this day. But, if it were necessary to look for relief, by reviewing the comparative amount, it will be found that the interest of five years' full pay, at six per cent. per annum, is equal to three-fifths of the whole amount of half pay for life: for example, take the advance to a captain, of five years' full pay, at forty dollars per month, $2,400, the annual interest on which would make the sum of $144 at six per centum, and the whole amount of half pay would make the sum of $240 per annum.

The advance of five years' full pay will also be found equal to the present worth of half pay for more than fifteen years. The committee cannot, therefore, discover such a great inadequacy in the amount stipulated. The resolution of March, 1783, provided that the five years' full pay should be in money, or securities on interest at six per cent. per annum, as Congress should find most convenient; the said securities being such as should be given to the other creditors of the United States.

Congress found it most convenient to pay in securities on interest, and for this purpose gave certificates conformable to the stipulation; the only evidence of debt in their power, and the same as were given to other creditors of the United States; the faith of the nation was pledged for the payment of these certificates, and the pledge was subsequently redeemed by the payment of the nominal amount, with interest, in gold or silver, or equivalents, in the hands of the officer or his assignee. If the officers could not command the money in hand for these certificates, neither could they have done so at that day for their half pay, had there been no commutation: gold and silver were not in the reach of Government at that period. This is suggested only to show that the mode of payment alone was changed, and that the commutation was granted as a fair equivalent.

Upon the view taken by the memorialists, the committee could not see any justice in confining the prayer of the petitioner to those only who still survive. To provide for those, upon the principle of justice and legal obligation, and suffer the dead to be forgotten, would be but a partial remuneration; the heirs of the deceased would have equal claims upon the Government as the officer who survives. Again, the memorialists ask a resumption of the original contract, to which the same objections may be urged as in the year 1783. If then deemed objectionable, because not in accordance with the genius of our institutions, nor congenial with the sentiments of the American people, it may be equally so at this day. Upon the most extensive view which the committee have taken of this subject, they have found difficulties still thickening, and, to answer the prayer of the petition to its extent, would, in the opinion of the committee, go to establish a principle fraught with much evil. Conscious, at the same time, of the merits and worth of these distinguished heroes, whose devotion and deeds have given such glory and such happiness to our country; conscious of their patriotism and valor, which have imposed lasting obligations upon the grateful remembrance of the nation, the committee could not reconcile to their feelings or duty an entire rejection of the memorial; and they have looked for a combination of the principles of equity and of gratitude, on which might be rewarded, in some little degree, the labor and sufferings of the memorialists, without involving future difficulties, in the establishment of a dangerous precedent; this principle has been found in the depreciation of the commutation certificate, and the losses sustained by the untimely sale of these certificates. It is a well attested fact, that most of those certificates were sold at an amount of not more than from one-fifth to one-tenth of their nominal value. Gold and silver not being in the power of the Government, the pressing and immediate want of the holders rendered it necessary for them to dispose of their certificates at any price; and, upon this view of the subject, the committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That each officer of the Revolutionary army who was entitled to half pay for life under the several resolves of Congress upon that subject, and afterwards, in commutation thereof, received the amount of five years' full pay, in certificates or securities of the United States, shall now be paid, by the United States, the nominal amount of such certificates or securities, without interest, deducting therefrom one-eighth part of the said amount.

MEMORIAL AND STATEMENT.

To the honorable the Senate and the honorable House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, the memorial of the subscriber, Solicitor on behalf of the surviving Officers of the Revolutionary Army of the United States, most respectfully represents:

That his constituents, the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, in renewing their application to your honorable Houses, for an equitable settlement of the half pay, as stipulated by the resolves of Congress, are not more impelled by the afflicting necessity, to which the faithful devotion of their youth to the military service of their country has reduced them in the decline of life, than by a sense of duty to themselves, as men of honor, to demonstrate and establish, by incontrovertible proof, the truth and justice of the claim which they have preferred; and relying on the equity of the national councils, under such information, they have instructed your memorialist to state the following facts, with the evidence by which they are supported:

By the resolves of Congress, of August 11th, 1779, October 21st, 1780, and January 17th, 1781, it was stipulated that half pay for life should be allowed to the officers of the Revolutionary army, whose terms of service are specified in the said resolves.

The proofs of this stipulation are recorded in the acts of the Government, under the several dates above recited—and the repetition of the promise, so often made, not only declared the gratitude of the Government to the officers, for services already rendered, but manifested its anxiety for the continuance of those services, which it thus solemnly stipulated to reward.

The contract, on the part of the officers, was faithfully performed, at the sacrifice of every personal consideration, and the entire relinquishment of private pursuits.

The proof of this fact is recorded in the independence and sovereignty of the United States—and is but too sadly attested by the necessity which urges the present appeal to the justice of Government.

On the part of Government, no variance from the terms of the contract was disclosed until the 22d of March, 1783, (the preliminary articles of peace being then signed,) when a prejudice against the half pay having been excited in some sections of our country, the senior officers of the army suggested the idea of a commutation, which, although generally objected to by the junior officers, was, under the influence of age and rank, adopted by the lines composing the main army; and the resolve of Congress, proposing a commutation of five years' full pay, in lieu of the half pay for life, which had been so repeatedly stipulated, and which had unquestionably held an influence in deciding the younger portion of the officers to an abstracted pursuit of military duty, was passed.

Independently, however, of the objections offered by the junior officers of the main army, to the commutation of the half pay, there is a fact of decisive importance, as regards a large portion of the officers, in relation to that change of the compensation.

The officers of the lines of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and some corps of Virginia, had no voice whatever, either by lines or as individuals, in the question of commutation. They had been made prisoners of war before and at the capitulation of Charleston, on the 15th of May, 1780, and were not afterwards reorganized.

Your memorialist was at that time a captain of the first regiment of South Carolina, and aid-de-camp to Major General Lincoln, who then commanded in the Southern Department; and your memorialist, being afterwards appointed Assistant Secretary of War, is enabled to assure your honorable Houses that this statement is strictly correct. He is not, however, instructed to request any distinction; and he believes that the generous spirits of those lines, who survive to unite with their brother officers in the present application, do not desire to be separated from their faithful comrades in honor and misfortune; but, confiding on the justice of the claim, await with them that equitable decision, which the just and magnanimous spirit of the National Councils shall award.

In addition to facts so conclusive as those already adduced in favor of the claim, your memorialist begs leave, with the most respectful deference, to state to your honorable House that, in commuting the half pay for life, an error of the most injurious nature to the officers was (no doubt inadvertently) committed—such an error, indeed, as, without impeaching the integrity of the Government, need only to be mentioned, even at this distant period, to procure immediate redress to the injured party.

The average age of the officers of the Revolutionary army, at the close of the war, in 1783, could not, by just computation, be reckoned beyond thirty-five years, which on an estimate of the expectation of life, collected from the most approved writers on annuities, would have entitled the officers to an average commutation of ten years and six months' full pay, instead of five years; and would have allowed to the younger officers, who disagreed to the commutation, an average of twelve years' full pay.

From these data your memorialist concludes that if the commutation of five years' full pay had been paid to his constituents in gold or silver, they would at this time, under the error here stated, have had a clear and equitable claim for the additional sum of five years and six months' principal of the full pay, with its accumulation of thirty-five years' interest, amounting to a sum far beyond the moderate proposition, which they now submit to your honorable Houses, of resuming the original contract without charging any interest on the arrearages of the half-pay, or making any deduction for the loss which they sustain in allowing the full nominal amount of the commutation certificate to be refunded, instead of the one-eighth or one tenth part which they received, on a sale forced for want of bread, twelve years after it was charged to them as gold or silver—no provision having been made by the Government in that time to redeem the principal or to pay any part of the interest.

Were it necessary to adduce any additional proofs in support of the claim, your memorialist apprehends that complete confirmation of all the facts and opinions herein stated will be found in the memorial of the citizens of the United States, which he is charged to present to your honorable Houses in behalf of his constituents, the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army. In that minute and interesting representation their services are not only gratefully recognised and appreciated, and the justice of their claim completely admitted, but a pledge is given by many thousands of the most respectable citizens that they will cheerfully contribute their proportion of assessment to the just and grateful purpose of fulfilling this national engagement.

As this liberal interposition in behalf of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, by the citizens of the United States, to many of whom public trusts of great importance are confided, is of high authority, and not only establishes the justice of the claim, but gives a pledge to make provision for its discharge, your memorialist, under the sanction, and in the words of their solicitation, on behalf of his constituents, most respectfully and most earnestly entreats that an act may be passed directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the claims of each surviving officer of the Revolutionary army of the United States, who, by the resolves of Congress, were entitled to half pay for life—calculating the amount of the principal of the arrearages from the time of his reduction, and deducting therefrom five years' full pay—and the balance of arrearages being thus ascertained, to issue a certificate, bearing interest of six per cent. per annum, to the officer for the amount of said balance; and the officer to be thenceforth entitled to receive half pay, in half yearly payments, for and during the term of his natural life.

As the relief to be received by the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, whose average age now approaches seventy years, will be greatly increased by the promptitude with which it is accorded, your memorialist also entreats that the attention of your honorable Houses may be directed to this interesting consideration. And your memorialist will ever pray.

Solicitor on behalf of the Officers of the Revolutionary Army of the U. S.

In Congress August 11, 1779.

"Resolved, That the half pay provided by the resolution of the 15th May, 1778, be extended to continue for life, and that the holding of a civil office under the United States, or either of them, shall be no bar to prevent any officer from receiving the same."

In Congress, October 21, 1780.

"Resolved, That the Commander-in-Chief, and commanding officer in the Southern department, direct the officers of each State to meet and agree upon the officers for the regiments to be raised by their respective States, from those who incline to continue in service; and where it cannot be done by agreement, to be determined by seniority; and make return of those who are to remain, which is to be transmitted to Congress, together with the names of the officers reduced, who are to be allowed half pay for life.

"Resolved, That the officers who shall continue in the service to the end of the war, shall also be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the time of their reduction."

"Resolved, That all officers in the hospital department, and medical staff, hereinafter mentioned, who shall continue in service to the end of the war, or be reduced before that time as supernumeraries, shall be entitled to, and receive, during life, in lieu of half pay, the following allowance," &c.

By the preceding resolves of Congress, so often repeated, it is incontestably proved to have been the intention of Government to make a provision for the officers during life, to the full amount of their half pay, respectively—and the subjoined resolve, which proposed the commutation, expressly states that it should be for an equivalent.

"On the report of a committee, consisting of Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Dyer, and Mr. Bedford, to whom was referred a motion of Mr. Dyer, together with the memorial of the officers of the Army, and the report of the committee thereon; Congress came to the following resolutions:

"Whereas, the officers of the several lines under the immediate command of his Excellency General Washington, did, by their late memorial, transmitted 15th Con. 2d Sess.—12

by their committee, represent to Congress, that the half pay granted by sundry resolutions, was regarded in an unfavorable light by the citizens of some of these States, who would prefer a compensation for a limited term of years, or by a sum in gross, to an establishment for life; and did, on that account, solicit a commutation of their half pay for an equivalent, in one of the two modes abovementioned, in order to remove all subject of dissatisfaction from the minds of their fellow-citizens. And whereas Congress are desirous as well of gratifying the reasonable expectations of the officers of the Army, as of removing all objections which may exist in any part of the United States to the principle of the half pay establishment, for which the faith of the United States has been pledged; persuaded that those objections can only arise from the nature of the compensation, not from any indisposition to compensate those whose services, sacrifices, and sufferings, have so just a title to the approbation and rewards of their country: Therefore,

"Resolved, That such officers as are now in service, and shall continue therein to the end of the war, shall be entitled to receive the amount of five years full pay, in money, or securities on interest, at six per cent. per annum, as Congress shall find most convenient, instead of the half pay promised for life, by the resolution of the 21st day of October, 1780; the said securities to be such as shall be given to the other creditors of the United States, provided it be at the option of the lines of the respective States, and not of officers individually in those lines, to refuse or accept the same; and provided, also, that their election shall be signified to Congress through the Commander-in-Chief, from the lines under his immediate command, within two months, and through the commanding officer of the southern army, from those under his command, within six months from the date of this resolution.

"That the same commutation shall extend to the corps not belonging to the lines of particular States, and who are entitled to half pay for life, as aforesaid; the acceptance or refusal to be determined by corps, and to be signified in the same manner and within the same time as abovementioned.

"That all officers belonging to the hospital department, who are entitled to half pay by the resolution of the 27th day of January, 1781, may collectively agree to accept or refuse the aforesaid commutation, signifying the same through the Commander-in-Chief, within six months from this time.

"That such officers as have retired at different periods, entitled to half pay for life, may collectively, in each State of which they are inhabitants, accept or refuse the same—their assent or refusal to be signified by agents, authorized for that purpose, within six months from this period; that with respect to such retiring officers, the commutation, if accepted by them, shall be in lieu of whatever may be now due to them, since the time of their retiring from service, as well as of what might hereafter become due; and that, so soon as their acceptance shall be signified, the superintendent of finance be, and he is hereby, directed to take measures for the settlement of their accounts accordingly, and to issue to them certificates bearing interest at six per cent. That all officers entitled to half pay for life, not included in the preceding resolution, may also collectively agree to accept or refuse the aforesaid commutation, signifying the same within six months from this time."

Such were the resolutions of Congress, which stipulated that half pay for life should be allowed to the officers of the Revolutionary Army of the United States; and such the resolve which proposed to commute the half pay for life, for a gross sum in money or securities, which should, in the express words of the resolve, be equivalent to the half pay for life—that is to say, by estimating the expectation of life, according to the average age of the officers, which could not, by correct computation, be reckoned beyond thirty-five years. It remains, therefore, by a just and accurate calculation of the half pay for life, in all its relations and dependencies, to demonstrate that the commutation, by the erroneous estimate of five years, instead of ten years and six months full pay, has been productive of immense loss to the officers, and of correspondent gain and advantage to the public, on principles which no policy could require, and no reasoning can justify, as appears by the following

At the close of the war for independence, in 1783, there were about 2,000 officers entitled, by the resolves of Congress, to half pay for life, which, calculated at the average rate of captains' half pay, amounted, at $240 per annum, to $480,000.

The commutation of which, on the expectation of life at thirty-five years, which was the average age of the officers of the Revolutionary Army of the United States, at the close of the war in 1783, ought, according to the annexed statements of Dr. Price and Mr. Morgan, and the opinions of all the most approved writers on annuities, to have been estimated at the rate of ten years and six months full pay, and would have amounted to - $10,080,000

But on the estimate of five years, the rate at which the resolve of Congress, instead of an equivalent, fixed the commutation, either by arbitrary decision or erroneous calculation, which, on every principle, ought to be corrected, the commutation only amounted to - 4,800,000

Occasioning an aggregate loss to the officers of - $5,280,000

And to each officer an average loss in principal of - $2,840

And a loss in interest, at six per cent., for thirty-five years, of - 5,544

Making a total loss to each officer of - $8,184

And an advantage to the public, against the resolve of Congress that the commutation ought to be an equivalent for the half pay, and against every equitable principle, amounting to - $5,280,000

And thirty-five years interest thereon, at six per cent. - 11,088,000

Total advantage to the public, by not making the commutation a just equivalent, according to the resolve of Congress of March 22, 1783 - $16,368,000

Say sixteen millions three hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars gain to the public and loss to the officers, against the plainest principles of justice, on the calculation of simple interest, and according to the payment of interest on the public debt, quarterly, and by compound interest, amounting to forty-two millions two hundred and ninety thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars.

And for which enormous sum the surviving officers, by their proposition to resume the original contract of half pay for life, relinquishing all arrearages of interest, and allowing the full nominal amount of the commutation certificate, (of which they only received one-eighth or one-tenth part,) to be refunded; and, estimating the survivors at two hundred, they would only receive in surties, as the principal of arrearages, $1,200,000.

With half pay per annum to 200 officers, whose average age amounts to seventy years, $48,000.

Whereas, at compound interest, calculated annually, the loss to the officers, by only allowing five years instead of ten years and six months full pay, which was the just equivalent of commutation for the half pay, and to which the average age of thirty-five years was fully entitled, is $40,582,496 23.

Being to each officer an average loss of $20,291.

For which they propose to receive an aggregate of $1,200,000.

Leaving to the public, in thirty-five years, a clear gain on their hard-earned annuity, of $39,382,496 23.

Exclusive of $48,000, the amount of half pay to 200 officers, whose average age is seventy years; or, deducting even the capital of that annuity, a clear gain to the public of $38,582,496 22.

Such, at the close of an eight years' war, in which the independence and sovereignty of the United States were established, was the cruel result to faithful public servants, whose abstracted devotion to the cause of their country, in her military service, had left them no other means of support than the stipulated reward of "those services, sacrifices, and sufferings," which, in the words of the resolve of Congress of March 22d, 1783, "had so just a title to the approbation and rewards of their country." Or, in the still more emphatic language of their illustrious leader, the immortal Washington, when addressing the Governors of the several States, on the subject of the half pay and commutation, he states in his letter, dated

"HEADQUARTERS, NEWBURG,

"June 18, 1783.

"I may be allowed to say, it was the price of their blood and of your independence; it is, therefore, more than a common debt—it is a debt of honor—it can never be considered as a pension or gratuity, nor cancelled until it is fairly discharged.

(Signed) "G. WASHINGTON."

The facts set forth in the preceding acts of Congress confirm and establish, beyond the shadow of a doubt, not only the justice, but the moderation, of the claim now presented by the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, inasmuch as they prove—

1st. That half pay for life was solemnly and repeatedly stipulated to be paid to the officers, whose terms of service are specified in the aforesaid acts of Congress.

2dly. That, when it was resolved that the half pay for life should be commuted for a gross sum, it was expressly provided by the said acts of Congress that it should be for an equivalent.

And as the true intent and meaning of every contract are best collected, ascertained, and adjudged by the terms in which it is drawn, it is fortunate for the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army that the essential term "equivalent," used in their memorial to Congress, is not only recognised, but recited in the resolve which proposes a commutation of the half pay for life; and it therefore only remains to decide, on the best authorities, what is the correct meaning of the word "equivalent."

Dr. Johnson says that "equivalent," used as an adjective, means "equal in value," and, as a noun substantive, it means "a thing of the same weight, dignity, or value." And he makes the following quotations, viz:

"The slave without a ransom shall be sent,

It rests with you to make the equivalent."—Dryden.

"They fancy a regular obedience to one law will be a full equivalent for their breach of another."—Rogers.

Having thus arrived at the true meaning of the word "equivalent," which neither party can disclaim, as it has been expressly used by both, we proceed to inquire whether the "commutation," as fixed by Congress, was a full equivalent for the half pay for life, as stipulated by the same honorable body; and, to simplify the inquiry as much as possible, we shall continue to consider the half pay of captain as the average rate.

By the resolve of Congress of October 21, 1780, the half pay allowed to a captain for life, was $240 per annum.

By the resolve of March 22, 1783, the commutation was fixed at five years' full pay, which gave to a captain $2,400.

But by the depreciation of the certificate to ten for one, as stated in the report of a committee of the House of Representatives, in February, 1810, at which rate it was sold for want of bread, twelve years after it was issued, and it only yielded $240, or exactly one year's half pay. Was this a full equivalent? Is there one man who will say it was anything more than one-tenth part of what had been stipulated, even at the rate of five years' full pay; and when estimated by the just calculation of ten years and six months' full pay, the fair commutation to which, on the expectation of life at the average rate of thirty-five years, the officer was fully entitled? Is there an individual in the community who will say that it amounted even to the one-twentieth part of the sum which, as a just equivalent, ought to have been paid to the annuitant?

In both of these statements it is clearly shown that the error and defalcation were exclusively on the part of the public, as appears by the following facts:

1. No provision was made for many years after the date of the commutation certificate, (which had been fixed by Congress at one-half of what ought to have been its amount, say five instead of ten,) to redeem the principal, or to pay any part of the interest; it was utterly unproductive to the starving veteran, to whom twelve years before it had been paid as gold and silver, and, forced by want of bread, he sold it at a depreciation of ten for one!

2d. Admitting that this depreciated voucher was to be considered in the hand of the officer at its nominal value, equal to gold or silver, still its full nominal value, estimated in specie, is proved by the best authorities to have been only equal to one-half of what should have been paid as the just equivalent of the half pay for life, at the average age of thirty-five years.

The principles of justice are immutable; at all times and in all places they are equivalent; and as the facts set forth in the preceding statement cannot be controverted, and as the conclusions drawn from them are produced by figures which cannot err, it follows inevitably that the claim which is now preferred to Congress for an equitable settlement of the half pay, is not only strictly just, but extremely moderate; and it is impossible that the enlightened Government of an independent and prosperous people should not cheerfully and promptly comply with the prayer of the petitioners, who have every claim to national justice and gratitude; and the more especially as less than the thousandth part, in value, of the land that was won by their toil and blood, would discharge the debt.

Having thus demonstrated, by the clearest proofs, that, according to the usage of our own and of other nations, in estimating the value of annuities, the commutation of the half pay for life, as fixed by Congress, at the rate of five years, instead of ten years and six months full pay, was not, if it had been paid in gold or silver, one-half of the "equivalent" which the condition precedent in the resolve of Congress required; it only remains to show, that even the legal right is impaired or affected by any technical objection that may be raised to the present claim for an equitable settlement—as the plea of "contract" is completely rebutted by the non-fulfilment of the "equivalent" which the condition precedent, forming the very basis of the resolve of Congress which proposed the commutation had stipulated—nor can even the allegation of "acceptance" be suggested, as all personal option was taken from the officer by the said resolve, which expressly and exclusively referred the acceptance of the commutation to "lines and corps," thereby destroying the vested right of the individual to the half pay for life, against his consent, and without rendering the stipulated equivalent!

* To avoid the possibility of underrating the age of the officers of the Revolutionary army, at the close of the war in the year 1783, the average of thirty-five years has been assumed, although it is the opinion of those who have the most distinct knowledge and recollection of the officers, that thirty-two years was nearer the average age. The Commander-in-Chief, General Washington, who had served in the war of 1765, was only fifty-one years old in 1783, and his age may be considered as the full average of that of the General officers. The average age of the field officers did not exceed forty years, and that of the captains and subalterns, who formed the great mass of the officers, was under twenty-eight years.

As a brief summary of the preceding statement, the following observations, faithfully deduced, are again most respectfully submitted to the consideration of the members of the National Legislature.

The claim of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army of the United States, for an equitable settlement of the half pay for life, as stipulated by the resolves of Congress, originates, as is declared by the resolve of March 22d, 1783, in "the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of those who have so just a title to the approbation and reward of their country." In the heartfelt expression of the great Father of his Country, "it was the price of their blood, and of your independence; it is more than a common debt—it is a debt of honor—it can never be considered as a pension or gratuity, nor cancelled until it is fairly discharged." According to incontrovertible facts, and the consequences which follow, by arithmetical deduction, it rests on the immutable principles of justice; is sanctioned by correct conclusions, both in equity and law; and is advocated by the universal voice of the very people who are to furnish the means of its discharge.

As no reasoning can invalidate these incontrovertible truths, no additional arguments can be required to enforce them. A claim thus supported, and for which the faith of the United States has been pledged, is with confidence and safety referred to the wisdom and integrity of the National Senators and Representatives.

FOREIGN MERCHANT SEAMEN.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the apprehension of foreign seamen deserting from merchant vessels in the ports of the United States. The bill having been read through—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, briefly explained the object of the bill. He stated the nature of contracts made by seamen with captains for voyages; which, being violated by the desertion of seamen in the port of destination, or at any time before the termination of the voyage, sometimes broke up the whole voyage, and ruined those concerned in it. He further stated that in all other countries there were regulations for enforcing the observance of these contracts, of which we, in common with others, enjoyed the benefit. These regulations the present bill proposed to reciprocate, by establishing similar regulations on our part.

Mr. NEWTON, as chairman of the committee who reported the bill, further explained its object. To obtain information on the subject, he said, a letter was at the last session addressed to the Secretary of State, to inquire whether the captains of American vessels had in foreign ports the same privilege granted them, to enable them to recover their seamen, which were proposed to be allowed by this bill to foreigners in our ports. To this letter an answer had been received, which Mr. N. read to the House, and which had satisfied the Committee, as he presumed it would the House, of the propriety of passing the bill.*

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, an amendment was made to the details of the bill, the effect of which was to extend the power of carrying the law into execution, to all civil magistrates.

The question being then about to be put on the Committee's rising and reporting the bill—

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said he was not prepared to say that this bill ought to be reported to the House. If the principle of it was correct, the details were exceptionable. The principle was, that if a seaman, arriving in the ports of the United States, quits the service of the master of the vessel with whom he has contracted, without permission, he should be surrendered without trial to the captain. The pretext for establishing this principle was, that other States extend to us the privilege now proposed to be granted to them. Mr. C. said he was by no means satisfied of the propriety of this exception of seamen from the rules applying to all other citizens of foreign countries. He was not satisfied that a seaman, having contracted to perform a voyage, should, under no possible circumstances, be excused from the performance of that contract. Yet, according to this bill, without inquiry into the facts, without examination into the treatment the seaman may have received on the voyage, the seaman was to be bound hand and foot, and delivered over to the captain whose service he had perhaps been compelled by tyranny or abuse to quit. I care not, said Mr. C. what is done in other countries on the subject; their regulations in this respect form in my mind no justification of the provisions of this bill. The details of the bill, he said, were moreover objectionable. The delicate class of cases arising out of our naturaliza-

* The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 3, 1818.

SIR: In answer to the inquiries in your letter of the 25th ultimo, with reference to the subject of the resolution enclosed in it, I have the honor to state, that in all the maritime States of Europe, with which I have been personally conversant, there are magistrates invested with authority to arrest seamen, deserters from foreign merchant vessels in their ports, and to restore them to the masters of the vessels to which they belong, conformably to their contracts in the shipping papers. The process in such cases is, as by their nature it must be, to prove efficacious, immediate, and summary; and the masters of American vessels have the benefit of it, in common with others. In the city of London, the authority is vested in the Lord Mayor; and, at other places in Great Britain, in the ordinary police magistrates. I do not recollect having ever known an instance in which masters of American vessels were denied the benefit of such processes, unless in cases when, by the laws of the country, the deserting seaman was, on other accounts, liable to be detained. The practice is, so far as I have known, the same in every part of the European continent.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

THOMAS NEWTON, Esq., Chairman, &c.

tion laws would be seriously affected by its provisions. Suppose a person who, naturalized according to our laws, would prima facie be considered by ninety-nine out of a hundred as a foreigner, to be demanded by a foreign captain as a deserter—he would, on his affirmation, be given up, and thus an American citizen would be subjected to this odious provision. Gentlemen might say, they did not mean to carry the principle so far; but, Mr. C. said, such an interpretation might be given by the magistrate before whom the seaman was brought. He never could consent, that, in every case of a seaman leaving his ship, or of any other description of persons, because a contract has been alleged to be violated, without inquiry into the ground of complaint, however just it might be, the alleged offender should be surrendered. If the bill was adverted to, it would be found that two facts only were necessary to authorize the surrender: first, that the party should have made a contract, and, secondly, that he should have quitted the service of the master within the limits of the United States. Were gentlemen prepared to say, that in no possible case a seaman might be justified in quitting the merchant service? If there was a possibility of such justification, Mr. C. said, they ought not to give their assent to this bill. He knew, he said, that commerce and navigation, to a certain extent, make slaves; but that slavery should not be made unnecessarily severe. If in every instance we are to follow foreign examples in our statutes and usage, to what lengths may we not go? Impressment of seamen for national ships, said he, is a foreign practice: we may be called upon, on the principles of imitation, to sanction that practice. But, said Mr. C., if our Navy could be maintained only by impressment, dear as I consider that Navy to the interest and to the glory of the country, I would see it annihilated before I would sanction such a practice. Gentlemen, therefore, he said, would not get his assent to the bill by telling him what was done in foreign countries. Over our country a particular genius of liberty presided: we must take care not to banish it by following, step by step, in the wake of other nations, and justifying ourselves for what we do only by exhibiting a precedent in what they have done before us. Mr. C. had other objections to the bill. If there were cases in which it was found necessary to reciprocate provisions with foreign Powers for the security of navigation, and such cases there might be, let them be settled by treaty, by reciprocal stipulation. If they extend in their ports but bare civility to us, let us do the same to them. On what foundation was the House invited to pass a bill involving so many delicate considerations, and objectionable provisions? Why, on the ground of a letter—and, without any disrespect to the author of it, a very loose letter, from the Secretary of State. Mr. C. here read some passages of the letter. The honorable Secretary, he said, had not told the House how far his personal acquaintance with foreign countries extended, nor what was the nature of the provisions in that country, analogous to those of this bill; whether in every possible instance a surrender is to take place; whether in all cases the seaman is inextricably yielded up to the captain claiming him. Mr. C. said he wished, before he could act on this subject, to see the laws of foreign countries, and not on such a vague indefinite account of them, to bottom such severe provisions. We have just learnt, too, said he, that, with regard to that Power with which we have had the greatest difficulty respecting seamen, an arrangement had been made, such as to remove all causes of complaint against her. I should like to see that arrangement, and examine its provisions, before acting on this subject. He hoped, he said, the honorable chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures would not hurry this bill to a decision. Let us first know, said he, the provisions of the foreign States with which the honorable Secretary has been personally conversant. Let us, above all, recollect, whatever foreign nations do, that here alone liberty flourishes, and personal rights are fully enjoyed; and that whatever we do should have reference to this peculiarly happy condition of our country, and be conformable to it.

Mr. NEWTON said he had not the least objection that time should be given to the Speaker, and to all the House, to obtain any information they might desire on this subject. But, he said, he did not view the provisions of the bill in the light which the gentleman had viewed them. The bill was a transcript of the act which passed as long ago as the year 1790, for securing to masters the services of American seamen engaging with them. Thus, it appeared, that it was no new principle the bill proposed to introduce into legislation, but as old as since January 20, 1790. Mr. N. said, he knew that the practice of impressment existed in some foreign countries. No one had a greater abhorrence of it than he; and the Speaker would perceive the bill proposed to confer no power to take up deserters from the British or any other navy, and restore them to their ships. It embraced the case of seamen deserting merchant vessels only, in violation and disregard of a voluntary contract. The captain, however, must also fulfil his part of the contract, and the magistrate before whom the seaman is brought may, if he choose, require proof of the fact, and decide upon the case according to his own discretion. Contenting himself at the present time with having made these suggestions, and desiring the subject should be well understood, and the information upon it be as full as possible, he had no objection that the bill should lie on the table.

Mr. WHITMAN defended the bill. The same provisions which it contains, he said, had been in operation in regard to our own seamen for twenty-eight years past, and are yet in force. In every seaport of the United States persons have been apprehended who have been alleged to have violated their contracts, committed to prison, and there detained until the vessel to which they belonged was bound to sea, and no inconvenience had ever been felt from the execution of the law.

With regard to their being delivered to the captain claiming them, without a hearing, the Speaker was mistaken in that particular. The act required examination before decision, and applied the same rules to this description of contract which prevailed in regard to all civil contracts. The gentleman's nice scruples on the subject would apply to any case in which individuals had by contract a right to the personal service of any other individuals.

Mr. W. said he should suppose the gentleman would be as tender of the liberties of our native seamen as of foreign seamen resorting to our ports; and it appeared that similar provisions had existed for near thirty years in regard to American seamen, without exciting any apprehension in regard to our liberties, and without endangering the rights of a single individual. And are we now, said he, to be frightened by bugbears, if the Speaker will excuse the remark, which could alarm only the most timid imagination? With respect to the reported treaty, Mr. W. said that the treaty could have no bearing on this question. He never knew a treaty to contain provisions for compelling seamen in the merchant service to return on board their vessels after deserting them. Heretofore, it had been supposed that the act of 1790, which was rather obscurely worded, did apply to foreign captains and foreign seamen, as well as to those of the United States; and the magistrates throughout the country had so executed it. But, of late, the question had been examined, and the act had received a different construction. It had, therefore, become necessary to supply an obvious defect in the law; in doing which, Mr. W. said, he could not see the danger to the natural rights of man, or the liberties of the citizen or foreigners, which the Speaker appeared to apprehend. With respect to naturalized foreigners, there could be no difficulty: the seaman would only have to produce to the magistrate the evidence of his naturalization, and the magistrate could not do otherwise than instantly liberate him. Apprehensions of abuse of power were, he said, no argument against necessary grants of it; and the argument from possible abuse would apply equally well to any other powers possessed by our magistrates as to this. When it was considered that, in all foreign ports, we enjoyed the right proposed by the bill to be allowed to foreigners in our ports, it was a sort of comity due to others to adopt this measure. Was it, he asked, to be considered a reprehensible principle, because foreign Governments had adopted it, when we ourselves have for many years acted on it? Mr. W. could not see any reason why the subject should be deferred. The bill, he said, did not affect British sailors only, but the sailors of every nation. Therefore nothing which is in the expected treaty, or is not in it, could obviate the necessity of a general provision, which, if not necessary as to British seamen, would be necessary as to all other foreign seamen visiting our seaports. There never, however, had been any negotiation between nations, that he knew of, in regard to provisions such as those of this bill; and how there could be anything in the reported British Treaty about the subject, he could not conceive.

Mr. CLAY said he was far from being convinced by the gentleman's argument of the expediency of the provision embraced in the bill. He was exceedingly sorry, he said, to have incurred the reprehension of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts; and congratulated that gentleman on the philosophical coolness with which he was able to survey what Mr. C. considered an assault meditated on the personal liberty of the citizen. That he could not so calmly contemplate it, might be owing possibly to the difference of their native climate, different modes of thinking, or difference of disposition. The gentleman, Mr. C. said, had not made out anything like a case. What was the existing law, to which this bill was likened? It was applicable to our own citizens, to be executed within the territory of the United States, and both parties amenable to the law. But there was a vast difference between this, and a provision for surrendering a person, being a foreigner, to the operation not of our own laws, but of laws we know nothing of. We have laws for the apprehension and punishment of deserters from our Army; and it has been a favorite object with the British Government to have a treaty stipulation for the reciprocal apprehension and restoration of deserters of that description: but that we have always constantly and properly refused. The gentleman might reason with the same propriety from our own provision in that case to the expediency of a provision for apprehending foreign deserters from an army or navy; and the gentleman might say, with equal force in that as in the present case, that there was no injury to natural liberty, nor any inconvenience, to be apprehended from it. There was, Mr. C. said, an essential difference between the cases: in the one, said he, the law applies to the captain as well as to the seamen—in the other, we should interpose our power against the seaman, and give him up to the tyranny of the captain, or of laws of which we are ignorant. Such a proposition he could not agree to at all, but, if at all, not in this shape: it should be by treaty stipulation; that we might know what we get for what we granted—on which point, he repeated, the information before the House was too vague. But, (said Mr. C.) now do attend to the gentleman from Massachusetts. He follows the seaman from the time he makes the contract, until he is brought before the magistrate on a charge of having violated it, and asks if there be any hardship in that? No: but what question is the magistrate to ask him? Have you made a contract? he will ask. If so, he is bound to surrender him without the cause of his leaving the ship being inquired into. No matter whether the contract was obtained from the seaman by force, fraud, or duress, the magistrate is to restore him to the captain claiming him. Mr. C. said he would admit to the gentleman, that in a case of clear obligation to act as a seaman, during a given voyage, being made out, and no better reason than a caprice of the seaman for violating it, he ought to be made to fulfil it. But the objection to the provision of this bill was, that it did not leave the seaman at liberty to show the ground on which he had deserted. No principle of comity, to which the gentleman had appealed with so much triumph, would induce him to give his vote for it. That inherent love of liberty which directs my course, (and which I trust, and am quite sure, the gentleman from Massachusetts inherits as well as myself,) forbids me to do so. If such a provision actually exists in regard to our own seamen, I regret it; in their case, however, it may be necessary and politic, but cannot be so in the case of foreigners, for reasons already assigned. In regard to the effect of such a provision on the rights of naturalized citizens, let me advert to a case, said Mr. C., which might have occurred at a period of excitement which existed some years back, and in the particular part of the country from which the gentleman himself comes. Let me suppose a certain magistrate, holding certain opinions very popular in that day in the same quarter, to have the case presented to him, of a seaman deserting the British merchant service. I am a citizen, says the sailor; and here is my certificate of naturalization. What would the magistrate do? Would he not tell you what has been urged again and again, even on the floor of this House, that the duty of allegiance is inviolate and perpetual; that it is contracted by birth, and cannot be shaken off? And would he not determine the seaman to be a Briton, his certificate notwithstanding? Mr. C. said he was not for submitting questions of this importance to the million of civil magistrates in the United States; for, by the amendment which had taken place, every justice of the peace was authorized to adjudicate the question. As to the case of indentured servants, which had been referred to as analogous, he doubted whether, in any State in the Union, if a servant were to make out a case of a breach of contract on the part of a master, he would be compelled without examination to return to his service. If any magistrate were to so decide, in the State in which he lived at least, the servant would have a clear remedy by writ of habeas corpus. Mr. C. protested, however, against the application of principles, arbitrary and rigorous, to all cases, which are fit only for extreme ones: and against the argument that, because in one case an arbitrary principle might be applicable, it must be equally so in all cases. In conclusion, Mr. C. said, he wanted information: he did not know that any information would obviate his objections to the bill; but, at all events, he was clear that it ought not to pass without more distinct information as to the practice of foreign Powers. He therefore moved that the Committee rise, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. WHITMAN added a few more observations. The foreign seaman, he said, had precisely the same remedy as our own in cases of violation of contract on the part of the captain, and the same laws and courts to resort to for redress. The provisions of this bill were to prevent individuals from taking justice into their own hands, in cases so important as that of service due on board merchant ships. The seaman should not be at liberty to say, I will serve no longer, and thus dissolve his contract. Contracts, once entered into, should be fairly fulfilled. If it were supposed that all powers confided to magistrates must be abused, there might be some ground for the objections to the bill, but otherwise there was none.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, December 8.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, ELIJAH H. MILLS, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report upon the subject of the duties on wines and books; which was read, when Mr. S. reported a bill to reduce the duties on certain wines, and to declare free of duty books printed in foreign languages; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the further consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon alterations or modifications required in the acts fixing the emoluments of certain officers of the customs, and it was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Frederick Brown; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, of a system providing for the abolition of the existing Indian trading establishments of the United States, and providing for the opening of the trade with the Indians, to individuals, under suitable regulations, "made in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 4th of April last;" which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a plan for the final adjustment and settlement of claims to land in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri, accompanied with the draught of a bill, providing for that purpose, prepared in obedience to a resolution of this House, of the 16th of April last; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Ordered, That the bill reported on the 4th instant for the final adjustment of certain claims to land in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri, be committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution that a committee of the two Houses be appointed to consider and report whether any, and if any, what further provisions, by law, are necessary to insure despatch, accuracy, and neatness, in the printing done by order of the two Houses respectively; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The resolution was read twice, and, after being amended, on the motion of Mr. HARRISON, by inserting therein before the word "accuracy" the word "economy," it was read the third time and passed.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill reported at the last session, (10th February, 1818,) supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri; whereupon it was ordered that the said bill be also committed to the Committee of the Whole House last appointed.

The engrossed bill making a partial appropriation for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1819; the engrossed bill for the relief of William King; the engrossed bill for the relief of William Barton; and the engrossed bill for the relief of the heirs of Adolphus Burghardt, were severally read the third time, and passed.

The House then, on motion of Mr. HARRISON, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning invalids, [conferring on the Secretary of War the power of placing invalids of the Revolution on the pension roll, in the same manner that he is now authorized to place on the pension list invalids of subsequent wars.]

The bill was explained by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on whose motion it received some amendments, rendered necessary by acts passed since the bill was framed at the last session, and was afterwards reported to the House, by whom the amendments were concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of William B. Lewis passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. HOLMES, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, rose to submit to the House a difficulty which embarrassed the proceedings of the committee of which he was chairman. In the investigation of some of the subjects referred to that committee, it found those subjects so intimately connected with some confided to another committee, that it was difficult to proceed, without infringing on matters not referred to its consideration. He alluded to the subject of the Seminole war. That war involved our relations with a foreign Power, which were committed to the Committee of Foreign Relations; but an important incident in that war, the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, was confided to the Military Committee; and, in proceeding on one subject, they could not well avoid the other. The Committee of Foreign Relations did not, therefore, know well how to proceed, unless they had the whole matter before them; and, in offering the following motion, it was not done without an understanding to that effect with the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. H. then submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's Message as relates to the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, and the conduct of the war with the Seminole Indians; and that the same be referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he had not been apprized till this morning, of the difficulty which existed on this subject. He cheerfully acquiesced in the motion, and it had been the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs to ask to be discharged from the subject referred to in the resolution. The Military Committee would still have abundant business to occupy them, in the military affairs of the country.

Mr. T. M. NELSON objected to this course, as he thought the examination of the Seminole war, and particularly of the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, belonged properly and exclusively to the Military Committee; and he was, therefore, averse to taking the subject from their hands.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to amend the resolution by changing the word "execution" for the word "trial," as it was the word in the original reference of the subject to the Military Committee.

Mr. HARRISON suggested whether it would not be better to retain both words.

Mr. POINDEXTER stated that his object was only to preserve consistency in the proceeding, by retaining in this resolution the words used by the President in his Message on the subject, and in the original reference of it. The President had said nothing about the execution of these men, and of course the resolution proposed to refer to a committee a subject of the President's Message, which was not mentioned in the Message, &c.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 66, noes 44.

Mr. HARRISON then moved to add the word "execution," that the reference might embrace both the trial and execution.

Mr. HOPKINSON thought this would be improper; for, although he was nearly indifferent about the question, it was certainly improper to refer to a committee, as a part of the President's Message, what the Message did not contain, and the Message was entirely silent about the execution of the individuals named.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON was agreed to.

Mr. W. P. MACLAY suggested whether the object of the resolution might not be got at better by simply referring those documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so far as they were connected with foreign affairs. The trial of those men seemed to him a subject peculiarly proper for the investigation of the Military Committee, and ought not to be withdrawn from it, &c.

Mr. BARBOUR, as a member of the Committee of Foreign Relations, stated what had been done in the committee, in relation to this subject. They had found that, in investigating our relations with one of the Powers of Europe, the Seminole war necessarily constituted an important link in the inquiry, but that this subject was referred to another committee. It was then proper to ascertain the sense of the House how they should proceed. The committee wished neither to infringe on the duties of any other committee, nor to shrink from their own. As to what had been said on the amendment, he observed, incidentally, that if the committee went into an investigation of the trial, it would be proper to pursue it to the fruits of that trial. As to the question of reference, he should be satisfied in whatever way it was decided, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, had readily consented to this transfer of the subject, because he thought the military question was not so important as the political question. The military inquiry could result in nothing but a report of facts, not in any specific recommendation. The President had the power to act when an officer errs, even to striking him off the roll of the Army. He asked if circumstances, seeing that the President had refrained from any exercise of his power in this case, had not shown that the conduct of the officer was thus far sustained by the Executive? If so, the committee could not interfere between them. The political inquiry was of a different character. That was to ascertain how far the nation has acted with justice and in good faith towards a foreign Power; and in what or where it had failed in its duties to that Power. If, however, the House thought proper to refer the military question, or any other, to the Military Committee, he would promise for them that they would discharge their duty faithfully.

Mr. HARRISON supported the view taken by Mr. MACLAY. It would certainly be highly improper to take from the Military Committee this subject altogether—a subject which was so strictly military, one already referred to it, and one which greatly agitated this House. It would, he admitted, be proper to let so much of it as belonged to foreign affairs be referred to the committee, and leave the remainder where it was.

Mr. COBB thought all this proceeding premature, because the documents had not been read in the House, and were not yet laid before it, since ordered to be printed. Relying, however, on the correctness of the copies which had appeared in the newspapers, he thought it a proper subject of inquiry for the Committee of Foreign Relations how those individuals, subjects of a foreign nation, of Great Britain, came to be condemned to death by an American officer. In looking into this subject there would be found some very interesting questions, intimately connected with our foreign relations. He found, for one, that these trials established an entirely new principle in the law of nations. He found it announced by the Commanding General, on that occasion, as "an established principle of the laws of nations, that any individual of a nation making war against the citizens of any other nation, they being at peace, forfeits his allegiance, and becomes an outlaw and a pirate." This, Mr. C. said, was a new principle to him, though it might be found in some work on public law, from which he had not learned what the law of nations was. He then moved to amend the resolution by adding the following:

"With instructions to inquire whether in said trials the Constitution and laws of the United States, or the law of nations, have been violated."

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBB, then, with the view of obviating the objections to the resolution, and accommodate it to the general wish, moved some further amendments; but

Mr. BARBOUR conceiving the subject one in which it was important to decide rightly, thought it had better lie on the table one day, and moved that disposition of it.

After some conversation on the postponement, in which Mr. HOLMES opposed it, the motion prevailed, and the resolution was laid on the table.

WEDNESDAY, December 9.

Another member, to wit, from South Carolina, WILSON NESBITT, appeared and took his seat.

The SPEAKER presented a remonstrance of sundry inhabitants of the State of Illinois, in opposition to the petition of the General Assembly of that State, for a donation of four sections of land to be laid off as a town for the seat of their government for twenty years.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the memorial of the convention of the State of Mississippi, presented on the 17th of December, 1817, praying for an extension of the limits of that State, was referred to the committee appointed on the 7th instant, on the memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alabama for a State government.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Alabama, presented on the 7th instant, respecting the Judiciary Establishment of said Territory, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, made a report unfavorable to the proposition of John Gardiner, to supply the soldiers with maps of their bounty lands at a reasonable price; which was read and concurred in.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Director of the Mint, giving the result of sundry assays of foreign coins; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Frederick Brown; An act respecting invalids; An act for the relief of William B. Lewis; were severally read the third time, and passed.

SEMINOLE WAR.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution yesterday moved by Mr. HOLMES, as amended on motion of Mr. COBB, in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's Message as relates to the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, and the conduct of the war with the Seminole Indians; and that the same be referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, with instructions to inquire whether, in said trials, the Constitution and laws of the United States, or the law of nations, have been violated.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Monday; alleging, as a reason for the motion, that the documents were not in possession of the members, not being yet printed for the use of the House: the publication of them in a newspaper was not a proper ground for the House to act on. Were the resolution for a reference merely of the subject to this or that committee, as originally proposed, he should have felt, he said, perfectly indifferent respecting it. But, since the amendment by way of instruction to the committee, an emphasis had been given to the motion, and a bearing by implication, which made it necessary to act on it cautiously, and with a full understanding of the subject. He was not prepared to pronounce an opinion, even by way of specific instruction to a committee, until the documents on which that opinion must be founded were officially in his possession. If, however, the subject was not postponed, he should move additional instructions, rendered necessary by the amendment.

Mr. COBB said, as an inducement to the House not to postpone the consideration of the resolve, that, on examining further into the subject, he had discovered that the amendment agreed to on his suggestion did not go far enough, and that further amendment had become necessary. With this view he had prepared some other amendments, which he would move if the subject was now taken up. Mr. C. added that he saw no reason for waiting for documents. The proposed inquiry related to subjects referred to in the President's Message, and it was the usual and common course to refer the various subjects of the Message to committees before the documents accompanying it were printed.

Mr. FLOYD moved to postpone the resolution indefinitely, under the impression that the inquiry referred to in it was already before the proper committees. If the Constitution or law of nations had been violated by any of the officers of the Government, as had been suggested, he thought that would be a proper subject to be referred to a committee specially raised to investigate it.

Mr. HOLMES said that the Committee of Foreign Relations had thought the matter properly within the pale of their duty; but, having seen that it was specially referred to another committee, he had thought it proper to endeavor to obtain the sense of the House whether the subject ought to be examined by the Committee of Foreign Relations or not. The truth is, said Mr. H., we have had a war without the limits of the United States, which has been carried on somewhat within the territories of a nation at peace with us. The conduct of the commanding General was a subject into which it might be proper for the House to examine. So far as respected his military conduct, that part of the subject belonged to the Military Committee. So as to the Seminole war—whatever regarded that war, with reference to its military conduct, and to the relations of the officer and the army to the country, belonged to the Military Committee. But, so far as related to the cases of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, these men were foreigners; they were said to have claimed to be British subjects, and it was thought by some that they owed a temporary allegiance to Spain. In this case, then, the investigation appeared to belong to the Foreign Relation Committee, as having a direct connexion with their duties. The Committee only wished that the House should decide whether they were or were not to examine the subject. If the House negatived the resolve, the Committee of Foreign Relations would consider it as the wish of the House that they should not examine the subject.

Mr. SIMKINS spoke in favor of postponement: the motion and amendment he thought, were founded on documents which had, indeed, appeared in the newspapers, but were not in possession of the House; which many gentlemen might not even have seen, and could not be prepared to act upon. Before he gave a vote for a resolve containing an instruction bearing against an officer of very high character, he wished to examine the grounds of the proceeding.

Mr. DESHA was in favor of postponement, as the subject was of a complicated character, and ought to be distributed, perhaps, among several committees. Whatever related to alleged violations of the Constitution or the laws of war, it appeared to him, belonged properly to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. COBB restated his intention, if permitted, to propose to divide the subject among different committees.

Mr. RHEA said that the question presented itself now in a shape involving considerations of far more importance than at first view it seemed to do. As he wished to know the extent of the views and objects of the gentleman from Georgia on the subject, he hoped the gentleman who moved the postponement would withdraw the motion, to give Mr. COBB an opportunity of offering his amendments.

Mr. POINDEXTER declined withdrawing his motion, and repeated his reasons for having made it. As it now stood, the very inquiry contained in the resolve implied censure on the commander of the Southern division of the army, and required a full investigation before it was decided on.

Mr. HOLMES, finding the debate obliquely entering into the merits of the Seminole war, &c., proposed to withdraw the original proposition he offered yesterday.

This, however, he could not effect, because the proposition had been amended, and therefore could not be withdrawn.

Mr. WALKER said that the resolution, as amended, involved a delicate question. If it did not implicate the correctness of the commanding General in the Seminole war, it certainly did insinuate that his conduct had been improper. As to what had taken place on the Spanish territory, Mr. W. thought this House had no right to inquire into it, unless representations were made through the proper authority on the subject by Spain. It would be time enough for Congress to act on that question, when it was properly presented to them. What he asked, would be the feelings of General Jackson and his brave officers and fellow soldiers, on hearing of the question being agitated here? He never had believed but their conduct had been correct, and according both to law and constitution; and that they had been the salvation of the frontier of the country which the honorable gentleman from Georgia particularly represented. He believed that, like all good men, the more their conduct was investigated, the more it would be approved—that the more they were tried, the brighter they would shine.

Mr. BALDWIN said, he thought it advisable, as the proposition had been the subject of so much difference of opinion, and was likely to promote unreasonable debate, that the motion for indefinite postponement should prevail.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, if the motion for postponement did not prevail, he proposed to move such a reference to the several committees as would be satisfactory to all. He particularly wished, since so much had already been said on the subject, that the motion should not be postponed, but an opportunity might be given to the proper committees to investigate it.

The SPEAKER intimated his impression that the whole discussion had been premature, and that the original proposition, being one of mere reference, did not authorize the range which had been taken in debate. Gentlemen on all hands appeared disposed, he thought, to anticipate the debate which would more properly take place at a different stage of the business, after the committees should make their reports.

Mr. COBB said that his views on the subject of the latitude of debate were the same as the Speaker's; but as a motion for indefinite postponement, which went to the principle of the question, was now made, he thought himself called upon to state why he could not assent to it, and why he wished the inquiry to proceed as proposed. The subjects embraced by the resolution, he said, were two: the Seminole war, and the trials of Arbuthnot and Ambrister. Did this Seminole war or these trials of Arbuthnot and Ambrister concern our foreign relations? Were they likely to involve us in any disputes with foreign Powers, or to affect the relations of this with any other Government? If so, the subject belonged properly to the Committee of Foreign Relations. His own opinion was, Mr. C. said, that these matters had an intimate connexion with our foreign relations. It was somewhat doubtful, he continued, whether the whole of this war had not been waged on unconstitutional principles. He knew very well, he said, that it had heretofore been urged in this House, and was a received opinion, that, under a law now in existence, the President could employ the military force of the United States for the purpose of repelling invasion by the Indians. But he had never understood that this power extended beyond the limits of the territory of the United States. It was yet a question, whether, under the plea or pretext of an invasion from without the limits of the United States, our army could be ordered without the limits of the United States to prosecute a war even with the Indian tribes. But, if this power did actually exist, it followed that the President of the United States could declare a war without the assent of Congress, unless the conclusion was drawn that it was not war to send a detachment of our army to carry on operations beyond our own limits. It is either war, said Mr. C., or it is not war. If it is, Congress, under the Constitution, alone has authority to make it. If it be not war, said he, and we must give it some other name, let it be called a man-killing expedition which the President has a right to direct whenever he pleases. It presented a question on which it was high time some principle should be established, if no such rule had existed heretofore. Mr. C. acknowledged that at the last session this question might have been brought forward. That it was not, however, was no reason why the House should now act equally erroneously. It was time to settle the question whether the President could make or carry on war against any nation, savage or civilized, without the authority of Congress. But another important question was embraced by the resolution on the table which it was now proposed to postpone. The President, he said, had informed the House that a war had been carried on by our troops on the Spanish territory, in the course of which St. Marks and Pensacola had been occupied. In the same Message in which this fact was announced, the President had told Congress that the commanding General had been led to the occupation of those posts by facts which came to his knowledge whilst on the theatre of action. Mr. C. said he wished to know what these facts were; and, inasmuch as this could not but be a proceeding affecting our relations with a foreign Power, it appeared to him properly to belong to the Committee of Foreign Relations to inquire into it. Mr. C. said he knew the reason which the newspapers had given for this proceeding. It was, that Spain, being a neutral Power, had failed to control the Indian hostility to us from within her limits. But the subject for inquiry was, who was responsible for this proceeding against the Spanish possessions? Who was to answer to the world for it? Was it not the nation at large? Was it contended that this burden could at pleasure be shifted from the shoulders of the nation to those of an individual? If not, it became necessary to inquire whether the measure had been authorized by the Constitution and laws of the United States. Has the President of the United States, said Mr. C., directed the Spanish posts to be taken? If not, had any subordinate officer a right to take them? He was free to say that the President was right in saying that he had no authority to direct the taking or retaining thereof; and he was equally free to say that he who did direct it had violated the Constitution of the United States. The pretext of the violation of her neutrality by Spain, Mr. C. said, was no excuse for the act. If she had violated her neutrality, it was the business of the nation, and not of any particular officer of the army or Government, who chose to take it into his hands. These suggestions he threw out to show the propriety of this subject being referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations. He had discovered, he said, from the Message of the President, that he disclaimed the power of occupying the Spanish posts. But, Mr. C. said, if the doctrine were once tolerated, that, under the cloak, if he might so express it, of prosecuting a war against an Indian tribe, a military officer may, without the authority of Congress, proceed to hostilities against a foreign nation, because they took part with the Indians, it was established that there was a mode of making war with a foreign nation without Congress declaring it. With any man of consideration, it must be a matter of some consequence that a war could be waged without the consent of the representatives of the nation. We see at once, said Mr. C., that that part of the Constitution is nugatory, and does not protect the nation from being involved in war without its consent.

The SPEAKER here interposed. He had hoped, he said, at least after the gentleman's concurrence in opinion with the Chair, that he would not have gone into a discussion on this collateral question, to which no bounds could be assigned.

Mr. COBB waived any further remarks for the present.

Mr. EDWARDS agreed in opinion with the Chair respecting the latitude of debate, and was willing to await a disclosure of all the facts before he made up a final decision on the subject of investigation. But, said he, are we to be deterred from inquiry because, as has been intimated, the inquiry will involve the censure of a high officer of the Army? I protest, and always shall, against doctrines of that sort. Let it censure him or not, no matter who is the officer, I shall vote for inquiry into any public matter, from which I shall not be deterred by the elevation of character, or station of the officer whose character is to be inquired into. For one, Mr. E. said, he saw no reason for rejecting or postponing the resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR said, he had been unfortunately called out when the resolution was yesterday introduced; but, when he heard of it, it was with surprise—surprise, not that the subject was not in itself important, but because it was already referred in the most ample manner. Whatever was in the Message touching our foreign concerns, had, at the opening of the session, been referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations; and it was their business, he thought, to have acted on it, without coming to this House for instructions. It was not very long, he said, that he had been a member of this House; but, short as was the time, an injurious practice had been since then introduced. At that time, it was the custom for committees to examine and report on the subjects referred to them; but now, at the suggestion of any gentleman, instructions were given to committees on subjects already referred to them, and which, without any instructions, it would be their business to bring before the House. Mr. T. went on to say, that things were already in precisely the same state before the committees that they would be were the resolve to pass. He thought the introduction of the resolution particularly unfortunate, too, as it was calculated to excite a discussion on a subject, vastly important in all its bearings, not fully before the House. He hoped the resolution would be indefinitely postponed. The Foreign Committee had their duty assigned them; let them discharge it. The Military Committee had also theirs, which they would no doubt discharge; and, in the end, he hoped Congress would not fail to do theirs.

Mr. HOPKINSON, as a member of the Committee of Foreign Relations, hoped the motion might be indefinitely postponed, that the House might afterwards dispose of the subject as they chose. As a member of the committee which had unfortunately fallen under the reprehension of the gentleman from New York, for what it had done and what it had omitted, Mr. H. said he took upon himself his share of it, with all the submission due to the censorial power vested in that honorable gentleman.

Mr. FLOYD rose merely to say, that, in moving the postponement, it was far from him to desire to avoid investigation, or to screen any officer, however high, if any such should be implicated in it. He only wished, when the House came to a discussion of this subject, that it should be with the aid of all the lights of which it was susceptible.

The question was then taken on indefinite postponement of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS, &c.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill allowing half-pay pensions of five years to the widows and orphans of those soldiers enlisted for twelve months, for eighteen months, and of the militia who died within four months after their return home, of sickness contracted while in service.

On the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, a debate of considerable length took place; in which Messrs. BARBOUR, HARRISON, T. M. NELSON, of Virginia, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and COMSTOCK, very earnestly advocated the bill, supporting it chiefly on the ground that it was required not only by humanity, but by equal justice, as the objects to be relieved by the bill were as much entitled to relief as the widows and orphans of those who died after their return home, of wounds received in service; that the expense was inconsiderable compared with the object, particularly as much larger sums were lavished on objects of comparative insignificance.

The bill was as earnestly opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, TAYLOR, TERRELL, SIMKINS, and LIVERMORE, on different grounds; but principally for the reasons that the Government had already gone far enough—much farther than any other Government—in relieving the individual distresses consequent on the war; that, admitting the provision to be proper at all, it would be opening the door too wide to extend it to cases of death within four months after the return of the soldier to his home; that the expense would be enormous; that feelings of humanity ought to have some limit in public expenditures, and that such feelings, if always obeyed, would find the whole Treasury insufficient; that it was time to draw some line of limitation, &c.

Mr. HARRISON said that he should be among the last men who would attempt to introduce into this country that system of sinecures and pensions which had produced so much misery in the other hemisphere of the world, dividing almost the whole population of Europe into two very unequal divisions—the one extremely rich, the other miserably poor. There could, however, he said, be no danger of this as long as our free Constitution remains. As long as the money of the people is appropriated by the real Representatives of the people, it will be given only for an equivalent public service, or for some suffering in that service claiming the public beneficence. An examination of one of the pension lists of a modern European Government would present a very different aspect from that on your table. Not moderate allowances for real services, but enormous grants for nominal duties, or for services to a Government whose interests are in direct hostility to the interest of the nation. It is not even the constant and unnecessary wars in which these Governments are engaged that have rendered their subjects miserable, but the wild profusion and extravagance of their corrupt Courts. It is this which, in the language of our great countryman, "obliges the European laborer to go supperless to bed, and moisten his bread with the sweat of his brow."

There are two kinds of suffering, said Mr. H., in the public service, which are recognised by our laws as giving a claim to the public bounty. The one in the case of wounds, or disability incurred in the Army or Navy of the United States. The other, an indirect suffering, as in the case of widows or children, who had lost their husbands or parents in that way. The claims of the first are not questioned. It is admitted by all, that the man who has lost a leg or an arm in serving the nation, as it lessens his ability to maintain himself, should be provided for during the continuance of his disability. But what appears to me, said Mr. H., to be a singular inconsistency; to the woman who has lost her husband who supported her, the child its parent, on whose exertions alone it depended for maintenance and education, our laws allow a limited assistance, leaving the sufferers often in a worse situation than it found them.

I consider this difference, said Mr. H., at war with the dictates of justice, of sound policy, and the first republican principles. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. H., to ask what was the motive for the enactment of the law of 1816 in relation to pensions? Was it to establish the great national principle of indemnity to the sufferers as far as indemnity could be given? Or was it intended as a mere temporary relief, as we would throw a dollar to the beggar in the street? If the first was the motive, the law was entirely inadequate to its object. If the second was the motive, it was, in his opinion, unworthy of the nation.

Equality, in the contributions for the public service, is one of the first principles of our Government.

The public burdens are to fall equally upon all in proportion to their means. No individual, and no family are to furnish more than their just share, either of money or of personal service, without an equivalent.

And yet here are 1,800 families who have contributed more than their proportion; some of them their all for the public service. You cannot, indeed, restore the husband to the widow, the parent to the child—but you can supply their places to a considerable degree, and, I think that it is your duty to do it.

The principle for which I contend, said Mr. H., may be more easily calculated by applying it to a small community. Let us suppose, then, that one hundred families were settled upon an island in the Pacific ocean, at such a distance from every civilized State as to make it necessary to form one of themselves—their situation would make it purely republican. All possessing equal right, and all bound to defend their little community against every aggression. The savages of a neighboring island attempt to dispossess them; a battle ensues, in which our little community is victorious, with the loss of five of their number killed and five wounded. The situation in which they would find themselves, is one for which they had not provided. The wounded men would say to the others, as we have been rendered unequal to the maintenance of our families by wounds received for the benefit of all, it is just that we should receive assistance from you to cultivate our farms. The claim would be readily admitted. As would, in the first instance, the claims of the widows and orphans of those who had fallen—but, at the end of five years, before the children of the widows had reached that age when they could labor for themselves and their mothers, they are told that they can receive no further aid while the wounded men are provided for for life. If this principle is admitted in our Government, our militia laws are most unjust and oppressive. They require the same personal service to be rendered by all, the rich and the poor. But the rich married man is allowed to furnish a substitute—the poor married man, unable to hire one, is obliged when called upon to serve in person. As the poor, then, fight all your battles, which is, perhaps, unavoidable, it is just and right the consequences of their service should fall as lightly as possible on their families. In the late war, it was to their valor and patriotism that you were indebted for the preservation of Baltimore, Norfolk, and New Orleans, and your Northern and Western frontiers. It is possible that when the great emporiums of your commerce were attacked, some wealthy men might have been found in the ranks with their poor fellow-citizens. At Baltimore, for instance, there might have been a merchant, possessed of a fortune of half a million of dollars, placed by the side of a mechanic whose family depended for support on the daily labor of his hands. The former might say to the latter, "let us remember that we fight for our country, our families, and our property, let us rather die than suffer our city to be taken." The latter might have answered—as an American citizen I shall always be willing to defend my country with my life—and, I was just thinking how cheerfully I would meet the enemy, if my situation were like yours. If you fall, you leave your family in affluence—if the lot should be mine, I leave a beloved wife and children to the charity of an unfeeling world. Our laws are unequal and unjust; they require the same personal service of us both, when one day's labor is of more importance to my family than twenty of yours would be to your family—that I would disregard if our laws had provided that in the event of my fall, the wealth which I have sacrificed myself to defend should be taxed to support my orphan children.

Pass but this law, sir, said Mr. H., and you take from an American citizen, called on to serve his country in the field, every motive which would prevent him from doing his duty. An American army would be a band of heroes. The tenderest feelings of our nature are not inconsistent with the most heroic bravery. There are moments when the powerful influence of domestic attachment will find its way to the bosom of the warrior, but, unmingled with any distressing reflections as to the fortune of his family, it will only prove an incentive to the performance of his duty.

Permit me, sir, said Mr. H., to give another example to show the injustice and inequality of the existing laws in relation to pensions. It is a case as nearly similar as possible to that which was stated a few days ago by my friend from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) and if he will give me leave, I will again introduce to the House one of the widows whose case he so eloquently supported. I will take the one who has received the five years' pension, and contrast the situation of herself and family with that of a neighboring lady, whose husband had lost a leg in the late war. Both husbands had performed the same services, in the same corps, and with the same rank; one lost his life, and the other his leg. To the latter you give a pension for life—to the former a pension for five years. Is there any equality or justice in this? Is it not setting a higher value upon the leg of one man than the life of another? It may be said that in the one case it is given to the individual who suffered, in the other, to his family. Sir, said Mr. H., is not the wife and the children identified with the husband and parent? The misfortune of the one is the misfortune of the other, and there should be no difference in the relief you offer them.

The principle for which I contend (said Mr. H.) is not a new one; it is sanctioned by the practice of one, at least, of the great republics of antiquity and by the opinions of some of the wisest and best men that ever lived. In the elegant work of the Abbe Barthelemy, entitled the travels of Anacharsis, (an authentic history with a fictitious title, as every one knows,) the author brings his supposed traveller to Athens at the period of one of the great national festivals. The ceremonies were concluded by the advance of a herald followed by a number of young men completely armed; these, said he, (addressing the assembled Athenians and pointing to the youths,) these are the sons of those patriots who have fallen in the service of their country; they have been educated at the public expense until they have reached the age of manhood, and are now to be dismissed to their families clothed and armed at the expense of the State. Such was the law of Athens, promulgated by Solon, and continued without interruption for upwards of one hundred and fifty years, until she was first corrupted by the gold of Philip, and her liberties finally overturned in the fatal battle of Cheronea. It is mentioned by Pericles in his oration over the Athenians who fell in the first campaign of the Peloponnesian war. Referring to this law, he concludes his speech in these remarkable words: "For when virtue is best rewarded, then will patriotism most prevail." Nor is this great statesman (said Mr. H.) the only evidence I can adduce to show the good effects produced by this law to the Athenians. [Here Mr. H. read an extract from Stanley's life of Solon, showing the approbation given to this law by Aristides, Plato, and the ancient historian Laertius, and then continued.] I consider these authorities, said he, as decisive of the good effects produced by this law in the republic of Athens—a Government more nearly assimilated to our own, as it regards the principles upon which it was founded, than any other ancient or modern. After the experience of a century, the ablest statesmen and most virtuous men declared it to be one of the most powerful causes which produced that ardent patriotism and heroic valor which distinguished the period that has been emphatically denominated their age of glory.

The eulogium of Aristides upon the Athenians proves, to my satisfaction at least, that the passage of the bill before the House will not produce those ruinous consequences to the Treasury which some gentlemen seem to apprehend. Himself, the incorruptible statesman who presided over the finances of his nation; the honest man who suffered exile rather than flatter the follies of his countrymen, affords the best evidence that it produced no pecuniary embarrassment to a State whose whole territory can scarcely be discovered upon a general map of Europe. Amidst all the calamities which war often brings upon a nation, the Athenians adhered to this law as the sheet anchor of their hopes. During the time it was in force their city was three times taken and twice razed to the ground. At the time that Pericles was speaking, the whole of their continental territory was in possession of their enemies, and ravaged with fire and sword. A pestilence also prevailed within the city with a malignity to which there is no parallel on record—an event which gave to a member of this House (Mr. HOPKINSON) an opportunity for an historical allusion, in one of the most splendid specimens of forensic eloquence which this country has ever witnessed.

Sir, said Mr. H., I consider that a great part of the money which may be taken from the Treasury by the passage of this bill will be as usefully employed for the benefit of the nation as it could well be. The pious and patriotic mothers to whom it will be given will employ it in the education of their sons, and they will never cease to remind them of the obligations they owe to their country. "Emulate the patriotism of your father," will be the reiterated lesson from childhood to manhood. To have such lessons taught to every youth in the country, I, said Mr. H., should be willing to give the yearly balances which may remain in the Treasury for fifty years to come. There is something in the female character admirably calculated to gain an ascendancy over the minds of those violent but generous youths, who are formed by nature to act a splendid part upon the theatre of the world; and who, when a proper direction is given to their passions, become the friends and benefactors of mankind. They listen with more attention to the mild admonitions of the mother, than the rougher mandates of an imperious father. It is very remarkable that the great votaries of liberty, both ancient and modern, have received the impulse from this source. The Gracchi, Brutus and Cassius of Rome, Agis and Cleomenes of Sparta, our own Washington, and perhaps Kosciusko, are a few out of the many instances that could be adduced.

I consider, said Mr. H., the law of 1816 not only inconsistent with other laws, but with itself. It directs that when the widow shall be married, and the children arrive at sixteen years of age, the pension shall cease; but it does not make a continued provision for those who have not arrived at the age of sixteen; and many of the widows and orphans are left in a worse situation than it found them. What, for instance, can a woman with four or five young children have been able to save out of forty-eight dollars per annum? It has enabled her to procure a few comforts only, of which she will more sensibly feel the want, when the means of procuring them are withdrawn, than if she had never enjoyed them. It is not my intention, nor would it be my wish, said Mr. H., to make the allowance perpetual, but to limit it to those who had sons to the period of their reaching the age of sixteen.

From the length, said Mr. H., to which some gentlemen are desirous of carrying their system of economy, I apprehend that an idea is entertained that the wealth of the Treasury is the strength of the nation. But, however true the principle may be when applied to monarchies, I deny its correctness when applied to a republic. The strength of a republic consists in the correct principles of its citizens. Money is therefore never misapplied when it is used to disseminate correct principles among the people. Guard your Treasury, says the gentleman from South Carolina. Guard it, say I, also, against every unjust claim, and every expenditure inconsistent with the nature of our Government. But open it, wide as the gates of your temples, to every just claim, and for every expenditure which has for its object the interest or honor of the nation.

The gentleman from South Carolina has said that this is a popular measure. It is so, sir, said Mr. H. The money of the people could not be expended more to their satisfaction than by the passage of this bill. Go to the American ploughman, and speak to him of Montgomery and Mercer, of Pike and of Covington, and you will touch a chord that vibrates to his soul. Ask him if he is willing that their families should be supported from the Treasury, and he will answer, that, although poor, he is just and honest; although not a lettered man, he knows the source of the happiness he enjoys; of the immense distance, as to rights, which separates him from the ploughman of Europe—a distance as great as the wide ocean which rolls between them.

Mr. Speaker, said Mr. H., the persons who are to be benefited by the passage of this bill, do not come before you upon equal ground with the horde of claimants upon whose cases you daily decide. They are allowed to solicit for themselves—they visit the members at their lodgings, and urge their pretensions even in the streets. The veteran of the Revolution, when soliciting your justice, is permitted to exhibit, upon this floor, his war-worn countenance, and his locks, bleached under the helmet: and even the maimed soldier or seaman hobbles upon his crutches to the door of your hall, to excite your pity—to ask your benevolence. But the persons whose feeble advocate I am upon this occasion, are obliged, from the delicacy of their sex, or the tenderness of their age, to confine their sorrows or their sufferings within the walls of their own cottages. But, suppose it were otherwise; suppose the many hundred widows and orphans, the relics of the late war, were to be brought before us; with what different feelings should we vote upon this occasion. The thing cannot be—but I beg gentlemen to give some scope to their imaginations, and persuade themselves that they really see it. Here a venerable matron, followed by a large family of children; there, another, in the full bloom of beauty, a widow through choice, and under a sacred vow that the hero who had once filled her arms should never be supplied by another; the lovely boy she holds by the hand was an orphan before he saw the light; and more and more unfortunate than Astyanax, had never been pressed in his father's arms, and dedicated to his country. What man, said Mr. H., could resist this appeal, accompanied by the reflection that their misfortune had secured his own happiness, and the safety of the nation?

It has been urged, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. H., as a reason against the passage of this bill, that the Government had done all that could be expected, having complied with all the engagements they had made, and that those who fell had done no more than their duty. I regretted extremely, said Mr. H., to hear an argument of this kind, and was sorry to find that the events of the late war were so illy understood, or so badly remembered. Is it intended, said Mr. H., to assert that the Government can owe no obligation to its citizens, but what is contained in a written law? This is a dangerous doctrine to promulgate; your citizens may imbibe it—and wretched, indeed, must that republic be, where the obligation from the citizen to the country, and from the country to the citizen, is to be determined by a written law. But I trust, said Mr. H., that there is a sentiment of duty towards his country, in every American bosom, which no legislature can impose, which no law can define. It was, sir, said Mr. H., under the influence of this sentiment that thousands of your fellow-citizens acted in the late war. What but this drew the veteran Shelby from the comforts to which his age and services entitled him; from the dignified station of Governor of a most respectable State, to encounter the hardships of a northern campaign, and that, too, under the command of an officer greatly his inferior in military talent, and experience? The whole Western population acted upon this principle, as they did, I am persuaded, in other parts of the Union. By this principle you not only got men to the field, but, when in the field, they did more than any law, written or unwritten, obliged them to perform. The custom of war, which is the military law, authorizes an officer badly wounded to retire. Had the gallant Spencer measured his duty by this law, he might still have lived a blessing to his numerous family. He was badly wounded in the head and thigh, but he refused to leave his post, until a third ball pierced his heart. Where was the law which obliged the gallant Captain Ritchie to vow never to leave his artillery alive? He remained by the side of his piece, bleeding to death, when, by retiring, he might have lived.

When your citizens thus, sir, disregarded the obligations of law, in fighting your battles, will you tell their widows and orphans, who apply to you for relief, that you have nothing to give, having complied with all the engagements you made?

Mr. Speaker, said Mr. H., let the gentleman who votes against this bill, return, after having done so, to the bosom of his own family, and when he finds himself surrounded by every earthly blessing; when he sees happiness beaming from the eyes of a beloved consort, produced by his presence and his safety, let him think, if he can, upon those wives who have no husbands to return to them; upon those children who have no parents to bless them—and when, sir, he performs the pleasing task of instructing his children, particularly the darling boy whom, in imagination, he may destine to replace him here; when he would teach them a lesson of patriotism, drawn from the events of the late war, and describes the heroism of Pike, and the devotion of Covington; when he has made the impression he wished, and sees their little bosoms heave with emotion, their eyes kindle with the patriotic fire, let him change the subject, and teach them a lesson of republican economy, and tell them, that, notwithstanding their strong claim upon his gratitude, and the gratitude of the country, he had yet courage, under the influence of a mere Treasury calculation, to consign the orphans of these men to poverty and wretchedness. Let gentlemen do this if they can. I cannot, I will not, I dare not.

The question on engrossing the bill and ordering it to a third reading, was at length decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 68, as follows:

The House then, on motion, adjourned until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 10.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting documents in relation to the Navy Pension Fund, received since the report of the 21st ultimo, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the fifth section of the act of Congress, of the 12th of April, 1814, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana, and Territory of Missouri," to the inhabitants of that portion of Howard county, in the Missouri Territory, lying north of the Missouri river, and west of the county of St. Charles.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, a select committee was appointed to report a bill for taking the fourth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, PINDALL, and FULLER, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, for an additional compensation to the marshal and district attorneys, of the western district of Pennsylvania, the northern district of New York, and the clerk of the district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBERT MOORE presented the following resolution, which was read and rejected:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a bounty in lands, to the soldiers who enlisted twelve months previous to the late war, and who served out the periods of their enlistments, and procured their honorable discharges, and to the heirs and legal representatives of those having so enlisted, who were killed in battle, or died in the service of their country.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, the President of the United States was requested to lay before this House copies of any correspondence between the Governor of the State of Georgia, and Major General Andrew Jackson, relative to the arrest, or other proceedings against Captain Obed Wright, which may have been transmitted to any of the Executive Departments of the United States.

On motion of Mr. J. S. SMITH, the Secretary of the Treasury was instructed to lay before this House a statement of the progress that has been made under an act of Congress, of the 3d of March, 1817, entitled "An act to set apart, and dispose of certain public lands, for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive;" whether four townships of six miles square each, had been laid off, and reserved for the purpose aforesaid; and whether any agent or agents, acting for the French emigrants, have contracted for said lands, and on what terms; and whether such agent, or agents, are now residing on said land; together with the number of French emigrants that have made settlements on said reservation, and the progress that has been made in the culture of the vine and olive.

On motion of Mr. RICH, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to Aaron Balamy, of Vergennes, in Vermont, for his vessel, captured by the enemy on Lake Champlain, in the Summer of 1813, while taking on board a cargo of flour for the United States; and that the testimony taken in the case, under a commission from the late Commissioner of Claims, be referred to the said committee.

On motion of Mr. ERVIN, of South Carolina, the Judiciary Committee were instructed to inquire if any, and what, amendments are necessary in the "copy right laws," in relation to suits brought in the courts of the United States, between citizens of the same State.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the resolution submitted on the 7th instant, by Mr. SIMKINS; which was amended and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to lay before this House a statement of the sales, public and private, of public lands northwest of the river Ohio, the purchase money of which has not been fully paid; the respective years in which such sales have taken place; the credits given on such sales; the sums which have been paid thereon; those which are now due, and the periods at which they became so; whether any instalments are yet to fall due, and to what amount. Also, what description of paper has been received, and what is now receivable in payment for said lands.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed "a resolution directing a survey of certain parts of the coast of North Carolina;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Hall Jervey, was in part considered in Committee of the Whole; but, without concluding the subject, the Committee rose and obtained leave to sit again.

The report of the Committee of Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Captain John Cowan, passed through a Committee of the Whole, in which, after much debate, the report was reversed; and being reported to the House, the Committee of Claims were instructed to bring in a bill for his relief.

Ordered, That Messrs. PITKIN, ROGERS, and LITTLE, be the committee on the part of the House, in pursuance of the resolution for the appointment of a joint committee, to consider and report if any further provisions are necessary, to insure economy, despatch, accuracy, and neatness, in the printing, ordered by the two Houses of Congress, respectively.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS, &c.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act concerning widows of the militia," was read the third time, and being on its passage—Mr. DESHA moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 67, nays 77, as follows:

The question was then taken, Shall this bill pass? and passed in the affirmative.

CADETS AT WEST POINT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, reported at the last session, "for the admission of cadets into the Military Academy;" [directing that in all applications for the admission of cadets into the Military Academy at West Point, a preference shall be given to the sons of officers and soldiers who were killed in battle, or who died in the military service of the United States in the late war; and that a further preference shall be given to those least able to educate themselves, and best qualified for the military profession.]

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill by striking out the last clause, directing "a further preference to be given to those least able to educate themselves, and best qualified for the military profession," remarking that he saw no reason for the preference, and until he heard something convincing in favor of the discrimination, he should remain of opinion that it ought to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. STROTHER addressed the Committee at considerable length, in opposition to the object of the bill, urging chiefly that it was sanctioning a preference of a particular profession, and thus creating a privileged order in the community; that it was virtually declaring an unnecessary jealousy of the discretion now vested in the War Department, implying an opinion that it was not exercised properly; and would, moreover, preclude it from selecting the most fit and most worthy; and was perverting the true object of the institution, which was established for the general benefit, &c.

Messrs. HARRISON and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, replied to the objections of Messrs. SMITH and STROTHER; stating that the bill had been reported in pursuance of a resolution adopted on the motion of a late distinguished member of this House, (Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana;) that the provisions of the bill appeared to be required by the original purpose of the institution; that, instead of creating an aristocracy, it would tend to counteract any such thing, as the objects to be selected were from that class of the community whose pecuniary circumstances repressed any tendency towards undue influence.

The question on Mr. SMITH's motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. TAYLOR observed that, notwithstanding what had been said in defence of this bill, its effect was certainly to create a privileged order in the country; that, although the selection proposed might be expedient and laudable to a certain extent, there was no doubt that the department now vested with the selection would keep in view, as far as was proper, the principle proposed; but it would in his opinion be highly improper for Congress by a formal act to sanction such a distinction. In lieu, therefore, of the provisions at present proposed by the bill, he moved the following, as a substitute: "That cadets shall hereafter be admitted into the Military Academy at West Point, from the respective States and Territories, and from the District of Columbia, in proportion to the militia returns thereof."

Mr. HARRISON again protested against the assertion that this bill fostered a particular order of men. It might as well be said that the charitable appropriations for Sunday schools established a privileged order. It was no such thing. The bill proposed a benefit to be bestowed chiefly on the poor descendants of those who had served their country.

Mr. TAYLOR replied, that if there were Sunday schools to be paid for out of the public treasury, as this Academy was paid for, he should object, as he did now to its expenditure for a particular class: he should wish, in such a case, the benefit to be general, as he did in this.

Mr. SOUTHARD combatted the idea that this bill went to establish any aristocracy; it would have the contrary effect, by giving to the poor their portion of the benefits of an institution now confined chiefly to the rich, who sent their sons there to be educated free of expense, &c.

Mr. HARRISON reiterated his objections to the amendment, and observed, in addition to what he had submitted already, that the design of this bill was really to get rid of a practical aristocracy, instead of creating one; for it was a fact, he believed, that no son of a soldier (by the term he meant not also to include officers) had ever yet been educated at the Military Academy. Mr. H. then stated that if Mr. TAYLOR's amendment should prevail, he would move to add the following: "And that in all cases the preference be 'given to those whose parents are least able to educate them;' and intimated that he should then move an additional section requiring cadets to remain at the Academy until the age of twenty-five years.

Mr. CLAY prefaced the motion he rose to make, by observing, in reply to the opponents of the bill, that it was a new thing to hear of an aristocracy of the poor: he should not be sorry to see something like such an aristocracy, but he did not think the bill would be productive of that or any other valuable effect. Believing that the selection might be very well left with the Secretary of War, in whom it was now vested, and not being able to perceive that any good would grow out of this bill, if passed, he moved that the Committee rise, report progress, and then let the House get rid of the whole subject.

This motion prevailed, and, the bill being reported to the House, the Committee was refused leave to sit again; and the bill was laid upon the table.

FRIDAY, December 11.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of James Wilde;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. WILLIAMS made a favorable report on the petition of Colonel Isaac Clark, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Colonel Clark, and the officers and soldiers under his command at the time of making an inroad into the country of the enemy during the late war; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. POINDEXTER made a report, recommending the rejection of the prayer of the petition of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, respecting the settlers on certain public lands in the district of Shawneetown; which was concurred in.

Mr. P. also reported a bill explanatory of the act "for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri;" which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. MIDDLETON made a favorable report on the petition of Marquis de Vienne, accompanied by a bill making provision for the claim; which was twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of pensions, when the pensioner, by reason of insanity or other cause, is legally incapable of performing the acts necessary to entitle him to receive the same.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations or modifications are required in the several acts of Congress establishing ports of entry and delivery.

On motion of Mr. BARBER, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of procuring the field notes and plats of the reserved sections within the Ohio company's purchase.

On motion of Mr. HERRICK, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire whether the act entitled "An act for changing the compensation of receivers and registers of the land offices," approved on the 20th of April, 1818, requires any amendment; and, if so, what amendment is necessary to be made to the said act.

On motion of Mr. SIMKINS, the Committee on the subject of Revolutionary Pensions were instructed to inquire how far it may be expedient to amend the law, passed during the first session of the fifteenth Congress, granting pensions to Revolutionary officers and soldiers, so as to prevent frauds in the reception of pensions by pretended agents of, and in the names of, pensioners, who shall have died, after having, once or oftener, received their pensions.

The bill for authorizing the settlement of the accounts of James Wilde, and the resolve for a survey of the coast of North Carolina, &c., received from the Senate, were twice read, and committed.

The report of the Committee of Pensions unfavorable to the petition of John Porter, underwent some discussion in Committee of the Whole, in which Messrs. BARBOUR, RHEA, and SMITH, of Maryland, engaged; and being reported to the House, was concurred in without opposition.

The report of the Committee of Claims on the memorial of A. W. Hamilton, being called up, on motion of Mr. H. NELSON, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of it, and leave was given to the memorialist to withdraw his papers.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, after recalling the recollection of the House to the fact, that, at the session before the last, he had proposed a resolution for the reduction of the Army, announced his intention to renew that proposition. He yet thought the measure necessary. In all free countries, that standing armies are dangerous to liberty, was a truth generally admitted, and, in this country particularly, solemnly recognized. In this belief, he said, he had grown up; in this belief he had lived. His opinion as to the expediency of reducing our present military force remained unaltered by the events which had elapsed since he before suggested it; he might say, it had been confirmed. He had not thought proper at the last session to introduce this resolution. He had waited in the hope that some gentleman better qualified to sustain it would make the motion; in that hope he had so far waited at the present session. No one having undertaken what he now conceived his duty, he moved—

"That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the Army of the United States."

Mr. W. not wishing to hurry the motion, it was, at his request, ordered to lie on the table.

The bill authorizing the distribution of a sum of money among the representatives of the late Commodore Edward Preble, &c., passed through a Committee of the Whole. [The object of this bill was explained by Mr. PLEASANTS. It is to allow the usual proportion of prize money for the brig Syren, captured for a breach of blockade by our squadron off Tripoli in 1804, and taken at that time into the service of the United States; but subsequently sold at a reduced price.] The bill was, without opposition, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 14.

Another member, to wit: from Delaware, WILLARD HALL, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. STORRS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of New York, (the Governor of the State, and the mayor and common council of the city,) on behalf of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the report of the select committee on the petition of William Jackson, solicitor for said officers.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Bowie and Kurtz, and others, which was read and committed to a Committee of the Whole, to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS also reported a bill for the relief of Captain John Cowan and the company under his command, in the years 1814 and 1815, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RHEA made a report on the petition of Samuel Gibbs, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill for the relief of the said Samuel Gibbs, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of John Rice Jones, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill for the relief of John Rice Jones, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also made a report on the petition of the heirs of Alexander Montgomery; and on the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of authorizing additional evidence in support of the claim to land, of the said heirs, derived from the Spanish Government, through John Montgomery, to be received by the register and receiver of the land office east of Pearl river, which report was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Alexander Montgomery, deceased, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Baker, and the legal representatives of Peter Trouillet.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee appointed on the petition of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, and to whom was also referred the report of a select committee, made at the last session on the petitions of Thomas Carr, Andrew Jackson, and George W. Sevier, made report thereon, which was read; when Mr. C. reported a bill for the benefit of Thomas Carr, and others, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act to increase the compensation of the surveyor of the port of Patuxet, in Rhode Island; and An act for the relief of Matthew Barrow; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 10th instant, I transmit a report of the Secretary of War, with copies of the correspondence between the Governor of Georgia and Major General Andrew Jackson, on the subject of the arrest of Captain Obed Wright.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 12, 1818.

The said Message was read, and, together with the correspondence, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill of the last session, establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, and for the organization and encouragement of schools for their instruction and civilization, were discharged, and the said bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the compensation of the surveyor of the port of Patuxet, in Rhode Island," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Matthew Barrow," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act authorizing the distribution of a sum of money among the representatives of Commodore Edward Preble, and the officers and crew of the brig Syren," was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information of the progress that has been made under the act of Congress, of the 3d of March, 1817, entitled "An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands, for the encouragement and cultivation of the vine and olive," rendered in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 10th instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FLORIDA AFFAIRS.

Mr. HOPKINSON submitted a motion, requesting the President to lay before the House, if he should not deem it improper to do so, copies of any instructions which have been given to the Minister of the United States at Madrid, relative to the late proceedings of the army of the United States in Florida.

This proposition was objected to by Mr. POINDEXTER, as proposing an unusual course, and one not properly within the province of this House, but rather of the Senate—the treaty-making power. To obviate this objection the word "correspondence" was substituted, by consent of Mr. HOPKINSON, who considered the objection rather one of form than substance, for the word "instructions;" and the resolution was otherwise conformed to this amendment.

Having been so amended, on a suggestion of Mr. RICH, of the propriety of waiting to see whether the information desired would not be comprised in the communication on the subject of our relations with Spain, promised in the President's Message at the commencement of the session, and after some conversation on that point—

The motion of Mr. HOPKINSON was ordered to lie on the table.

EXTENSION OF MILITIA PENSIONS.

The bill to extend, for a further term of five years, the pensions granted to the widows and orphans of those militia who died or fell in battle during the late war, being the order of the day, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, its objects being briefly explained by Mr. HARRISON, was reported to the House; when a spirited debate arose on it, which occupied the whole of this day's sitting.

Mr. SIMKINS, of South Carolina, opened the debate. The bill he characterized as one of magnitude in principle, and worthy of serious consideration, also, as drawing largely on the national purse. He was opposed to the bill on the ground that, in granting five years' pension as an alleviation, for the time, of sudden and inextricable distress, the Government had gone far enough; and that, if poverty was a proper subject for the munificence of Congress, no limit could be assigned at which its liberality would pause. The same reasons assigned now for the passage of this bill, would be equally valid five years hence, and during the lives of those who were the objects of its bounty. He particularly objected to the pension system, carried to this extreme, as leading a class of people to look to the Government for support, rather than exerting that industry which would sustain them in plenty and add to the national wealth. As to the obligation of gratitude, Mr. S. argued, it had been fully complied with. No nation on the globe had been more liberal to those who had suffered in the service of their country than this, and he was not for going further. This it was probable might be a popular measure, but when the increase of taxation, which such expenses would probably make necessary, was felt by the people, he doubted whether it would preserve its popularity. Of a liberal expenditure for such objects, he was the advocate; but the expenditure might be too liberal, and had in his opinion been sufficiently so.

Mr. T. M. NELSON, of Virginia, remarked, in favor of the bill, that the amount of expenditure it would occasion was yearly diminishing by the deaths and marriages of the widows, and the arrival at maturity of the orphans. As to the unpopularity of the measure, he would venture to say, that there could not be expended by the Government any part of its revenue which would afford such general satisfaction as that which provides for the helpless and destitute widows and orphans who were reduced to distress by the loss of their supporters and protectors during the late war.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, was in favor of the bill. In regard to pension systems, he denied that there could be any analogy between that of this Government and of the Governments of Europe; the one being of moderate extent, and for actual services, the other of enormous extent, and bestowed on the principle of favoritism merely. Here, he said, were one thousand four hundred individuals concerned, as appeared by the pension list, who had contributed their all to the service of the country—the parent who supported and educated the child; the husband on whom the wife depended for protection and subsistence. The principle, he said, for which he contended—that the family of those who die in the public service should be provided for by the public—had been recognised by the best men and the oldest governments, and by those particularly to which ours bore the greatest resemblance; which he illustrated by a reference to Anacharsis's Travels, and to the authors quoted in that work. He went into an argument, enforced by cases which he stated, to show that it would be unjust to refuse to the widows and orphans of those who died in service the same compensation as was allowed to those who survived, but had been wounded: in the one case the pension was for life, and, on the same principle, ought to be so in the other. He referred to the gallant exploits of our Captain Ritchie, Colonel Wood, and other departed heroes, during the late war, to show the devotion to duty and to the country, which animated the American soldier; and hence argued that it was no more than just that the families of such men should be sheltered from want after they had fallen. In regard to the popularity of this law, if that argument were to have weight, he would vouch for its finding favor with the people. Go to any farmer—to any ploughman in your country—tell him of Montgomery and of Mercer, of Pike and of Covington, and you touch a chord to which his heart responds. Though poor, he is generous; though unlettered, he knows the history of his country sufficiently to appreciate their services. He knows the nature and value of his rights as an American citizen, and he entertains a just gratitude for the services of those who established and defended them. With such men, Mr. H. said, this measure could not but be popular. After drawing a contrast between the felicity of a happy and prosperous family, and the misery of one bereft of its only support and protector, Mr. H. expressed his anxious hope that the House would do whatever was in its power to relieve such distress by the passage of this bill.

Mr. RICH, of Vermont, proposed to amend the bill. That some provision ought to be made for those who suffer in the service of their country, would be certainly agreed by all; but that there ought to be some limit to this provision, he presumed would equally be agreed; though, with respect to what that limitation should be, there might be expected to be some difference of opinion. He should not vote for the bill in any shape; but desired, if it should pass, to make it as little objectionable as possible to him. He therefore moved an amendment, the object of which was to destroy the distinction in the amount of pension between the officers and privates; the reasonableness of which, however just during the service of them, respectively, he could not see as it affected their families.

After some observations of Mr. HARRISON against, and Mr. RICH in favor of the amendment, it was negatived by a small majority.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill—

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, spoke in opposition to it. The reasons assigned for this renewal of the pensions for five years, he said, were very different from those which were urged in favor of the original grant of five years' pension. It was then said that the regulars had bounty land, which went to their families after their decease, whilst the militia had none, though some of them had done equal service with the regulars. The pension had therefore been granted to place them on an equal footing. The bill now before the House, however, was founded on a new principle, of importance sufficient to induce the House to pause before they sanctioned it. He did not see how the same measure could be refused to the widows and orphans of regulars who had fallen in battle, nor where Congress were to stop. There must be some limits to this expenditure on the pension bill; which limits, he thought, would exclude the provisions of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, warmly advocated the bill, which he thought bottomed on the true principles of our Government, and sustained by justice; without reference to the duties of charity and gratitude. Geographical considerations, he agreed, ought to have some weight in favor of this bill, when it was considered how great was the extent of our country, and how small the portion of it exposed to an enemy; the burden of the sufferings in such defence ought to be equalized in some degree by a contribution from the common purse for the relief of those who suffered most severely. We have lately, said he, voted upwards of two millions of money annually, it is computed, (and I thank God for it,) for the relief of the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war; and that money is disbursed in the Eastern States principally, the West having been at that time a wilderness. And would gentlemen from the Eastern States refuse this small distribution of pension money among those who had wept tears of blood and of sorrow over the victories of the late war? The whole amount, he stated, of these pensions was not more than $100,000 annually; and where was it to go? To the patrician? To the wealthy favorite of fortune? To him who basked in the sunshine of ease and safety, whilst the brawny arm of the inhabitant of the West wielded his rifle and his bayonet in his defence? No; it was to go to objects which must command regard—to objects of charity, and who must so remain, &c. He hoped, therefore, the bill would receive the favor of the House.

Mr. SIMKINS again addressed the House in support of the ground he had before taken. If, he said, the House were to give the reins to these feelings, they might in a single day exhaust the treasury of the nation. There is not one among us, said he, though we may not, like the gentlemen from Ohio and Kentucky, personally have mingled in the scenes, who does not feel his bosom dilate with sentiments of gratitude towards the gallant defenders of their country. But, was this a reason why there should be no limit to the pension list, or why pensions for life should be granted to these persons?—for the same argument would apply to pensions for life as had been applied to the proposition for extending these pensions for five years longer. A regard to the state of the Treasury, and to the policy of the country, was as necessary as the feeling of gratitude. With respect to the popularity of this measure, Mr. S. said, he knew not the sentiments of his constituents respecting it. It was probable it would be popular. But he considered himself, as a member of this House, not a representative of a particular district, but of the whole nation; and he should act, in that capacity, as the public good appeared to him to require. He replied to several arguments in favor of the bill, and insisted more strongly on the argument that its tendency would be, as far as it extended, to weaken the spirit of industry and enterprise. The history of England, he said, afforded a commentary on such policy; by the operation of her poor laws and pension system, she had slid into an expense so great, that even the air they breathed, and the light of heaven, were become subject to taxation. He trusted, he said in conclusion, that he should always feel as grateful as any member for services rendered to the public, but on this occasion his object was to restrain the zeal of gentlemen to what he considered the sober rules of reason.

Mr. PITKIN made a few remarks in support of the ground he had before taken.

Mr. W. P. MACLAY, of Pennsylvania, moved to lay the bill on the table, with a view to a further examination of collateral provisions of other laws. Negatived, by a majority of one or two votes only.

Mr. HARRISON spoke at considerable length in support of his view of this question; and summed up his opinions in the broad position, that the children of those who die in the public service, ought to be educated at the public expense until they were eighteen years of age, and their widows to be shielded from absolute want, at least until in a situation to procure their own maintenance. He assigned various reasons in support of the bill, besides the assertion of the general principle.

Mr. RICH moved another amendment, to this effect: that no pension to the family of officers should exceed the rate of ten dollars per month. This, he said, was one hundred and fifty per cent. more than the allowance to privates, and was precisely the proportion, between officers of every grade and soldiers, established by the Revolutionary pension act of the last session.

This motion was negatived, 71 to 47.

Mr. OGLE, of Pennsylvania, made some remarks in opposition to the bill, principally for the purpose of denying the similitude between this class of cases and that of the surviving Revolutionary officers and soldiers. The motives which had brought them into the field were different, and the rewards of the Government to them ought to be different. The soldiers of the Revolution fought for liberty; those of the late war for fame and fortune. He also adverted to the distinction between the regulars and militia, which was made by the system proposed in this bill, and which he considered unjust.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Barber of Ohio, Beecher, Bellinger, Bloomfield, Blount, Boden, Butler of Louisiana, Colston, Comstock, Cook, Cruger, Davidson, Earle, Ervin of South Carolina, Floyd, Fuller, Gage, Gilbert, Harrison, Hendricks, Herbert, Horkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Holmes, Hostetter, Hubbard, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Lincoln, Little, McLean of Illinois, W. The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

TUESDAY, December 15.

Mr. BLOUNT, presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of East Tennessee, praying for an appropriation of the sum of four hundred dollars, out of the public Treasury, to be applied in removing the obstructions in the Muscle Shoals, in the river Tennessee.—Referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed on the 7th inst. to inquire into the expediency of holding the courts of the United States, within the State of Ohio, alternately at Cincinnati, and such other place, as may be hereafter designated by law, made a report against the proposition; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERT MOORE, from the committee appointed on the first instant, on the petition of John B. C. Lucas and Clement B. Penrose, made a report thereon, which was read: when, Mr. M. reported bill for the relief of John B. C. Lucas and Clement B. Penrose; which was read twice; and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Kenzie and Forsyth.

Mr. COLSTON offered for consideration the following resolution, prefacing it with the remark, that, as the subject of the Seminole war was one which considerably agitated the public mind, and on which every member of the House, and the whole community, were desirous of all the light which could be thrown on it, he should make no apology for this motion:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House any correspondence which may have taken place between this Government and that of Great Britain, relative to the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister.

On motion of Mr. RICH, who thought such a motion premature until the information promised in the President's Message should have been laid before the House, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures were directed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a light-house on Windmill Point, at the mouth of the Rappahannock river; and also, of placing a floating light on Willoughby's Shoals, between Lynhaven Bay and Hampton Roads.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the several islands, in the Tennessee river, lying within the limits of the Alabama Territory, for the improvement of the navigation of said river.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry, at the mouth of Grand river, in the county of Geauga and State of Ohio.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:
I lay before the House of Representatives copies of the remainder of the documents, referred to in the message of the 17th of last month.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 15, 1818.

The Message was read, and, with the documents, ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War, made in obedience to a resolution of the 17th of April last, directing him to report whether any, and, if any, what reduction may be made in the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, with safety to the public service, and whether any, and, if any, what change ought to be made in the ration, and in the mode of issuing it; and also, a system for the establishment of a Commissariat for the Army; which report was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The report is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 11, 1818.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed the 17th April last, directing the Secretary of War to report, at an early period of the next session of Congress, whether any, and, if any, what reduction may be made in the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, with safety to the public service; and whether any, and, if any, what change ought to be made in the ration established by law, and in the mode of issuing the same; and also to report a system for the establishment of a Commissariat for the Army, I have the honor to submit the following report:

In order to form a correct opinion on a subject involving so many particulars, as the expense of our Military Establishment, it will be necessary to consider it under distinct and proper heads: To ascertain, then, "whether any, and, if any, what reductions may be made in the expenses of our Military Establishment," I propose to consider its number, organization, pay and emoluments, and administration. To the one or the other of these heads all of its expenses may be traced; and, if they are greater than what they ought to be, we must search for the cause in the proper extent of the establishment; the excessive number of officers in proportion to the men; the extravagance of the pay or emoluments, or the want of proper responsibility and economy in its administration.

Pursuing the subject in the order in which it has been stated, the first question which offers itself for consideration, is, whether our Military Establishment can be reduced "with safety to the public service," or can its expenditures be, with propriety, reduced, by reducing the Army itself. It is obvious that, viewed in the abstract, few questions present so wide a field for observation, or are so well calculated to produce a great diversity of sentiment as the one now proposed. Considered as an original question, it would involve in its discussion the political institutions of the country, its geographical position and character, the number and distance of our posts, and our relations with the Indian tribes, and the principal European Powers. It is conceived, however, that a satisfactory view of it may be taken, without discussing topics so extensive and indefinite.

ciently small. The latter, it is true, received an enlargement from the uncertain state of our foreign relations at that time; but the former was established at a period of profound quiet, (the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's Administration,) and was professedly reduced, with a view to economy, to the smallest number then supposed to be consistent with the public safety. Assuming these as a standard, and comparing the present establishment (taking into the comparison the increase of our country) with them, a satisfactory opinion may be formed on a subject, which otherwise might admit so great a diversity of opinion.

Our Military Peace Establishment is limited, by the act of 1815, passed at the termination of the late war, to ten thousand men. The corps of engineers and ordnance, by that and a subsequent act, were retained as they then existed; and the President was directed to constitute the establishment of such portions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen, as he might judge proper. The general order of the 17th May, 1815, fixes the artillery at 3,200, the light artillery at 660, the infantry at 5,440, and the rifles at 660 privates and matrosses. Document A exhibits a statement of the Military Establishment, including the general staff, as at present organized; and B exhibits a similar view of those of 1802 and 1808; by a reference to which it will appear, that our Military Establishments, at the respective periods, taken in the order of their dates, present an aggregate of 3,323, 9,996, and 12,656. It is obvious that the establishment of 1808, compared with the then wealth and population of the country, the number and extent of military posts, is larger in proportion than the present; but the unsettled state of our relations with France and England, at that period, renders the comparison not entirely just. Passing that of 1808, let us compare the establishment of 1802 with the present. To form a correct comparison, it will be necessary to compare the capacity and necessity of the country then with those of the present time. Since that period our population has nearly doubled, and our wealth more than doubled. We have added Louisiana to our possessions, and with it a great extent of frontier, both maritime and inland. With the extension of our frontier, and the increase of our commercial cities, our military posts and fortifications have been greatly multiplied. Document marked C exhibits the number and positions of posts in the year 1802, and document D those of the present time; by a reference to which, it will be seen that, at the former period, we had but twenty-seven posts, the most remote of which was, to the north, at Mackinaw, and to the south, at Fort Stoddert, on Mobile river; but now we have seventy-three, which occupy a line of frontier proportionally extended. On the Lakes, the Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas, and Red river, our posts are now, or will be shortly, extended, for the protection of our trade, and the preservation of the peace of the frontiers, to Green Bay, the mouths of the St. Peters, and the Yellow Stone river, Bellepoint, and Nachitoches. Document marked E exhibits a statement of the extent of the line of our frontier, inland and maritime, with the distance of some of the more remote posts from the seat of Government, drawn up by Major Long, of the topographical engineers, from the most approved maps.

If, then, the Military Establishment of 1802 be assumed to be as small as was then consistent with the safety of the country, our present establishment, when we take into comparison the prodigious increase of wealth, population, extent of territory, number and distance of military posts, cannot be pronounced extravagant; but, on the contrary, after a fair and full comparison, that of the former period must, in proportion to the necessities and capacity of the country, be admitted to be quite as large as the present; and on the assumption that the establishment of 1802 was as small as the public safety would then admit, a reduction of the expense of our present establishment cannot be made, with safety to the public service, by reducing the army. In coming to this conclusion I have not overlooked the maxim, that a large standing army is dangerous to the liberties of the country, and that our ultimate reliance for defence ought to be on the militia. Its most zealous advocate must, however, acknowledge, that a standing army, to a limited extent, is necessary, and no good reason can be assigned why any should exist, but what will equally prove that the present is not too large. To consider the present army as dangerous to our liberty, partakes, it is conceived, more of timidity than wisdom. Not to insist on the character of the officers, who, as a body, are high-minded and honorable men, attached to the principles of freedom by education and reflection, what well-founded apprehension can there be from an establishment distributed on so extended a frontier, with many thousand miles intervening between the extreme points occupied? But the danger, it may be said, is not so much from its numbers, as a spirit hostile to liberty, by which, it is supposed, all regular armies are actuated. This observation is probably true, when applied to standing armies collected into large and powerful masses; but dispersed as ours is, over so vast a surface, the danger, I conceive, is of an opposite character, that both officers and soldiers will lose their military habits and feelings, by sliding gradually into those purely civil.

I proceed next to consider whether any reduction can be made with propriety by changing the organization, or by reducing the number of officers of the line, or the staff, in proportion to the men. It is obvious that, as the officers are much more expensive in proportion to their numbers, than the soldiers, that the pay of the army, in relation to its aggregate numbers, must be increased or diminished in the increase or the diminution of the former. It is impossible to fix any absolute proportion between officers and men, which will suit every country and every service; and the organization of different countries and of different periods, in the same country, has accordingly varied considerably. Our present organization, of which document marked A contains an exhibit, is probably as well or better adapted to the nature of our country and service than any other, as it seems to be the result of experience; for, by a reference to document marked B, it will be seen that it is nearly similar, with the exception of the general staff, in which the present is more extensive, to the organization of the Military Establishments of 1802 and 1808. It is believed that the proportion of officers of the line to the men, will require no further observations.

The staff, as organized by the act of the last session, combines simplicity with efficiency, and is considered to be superior to that of the periods to which I have reference. In estimating the expenses of the army, and particularly that of the staff, the two most expensive branches of it, the engineer and ordnance departments, ought not fairly to be included. Their duties are connected with the permanent preparation and defence of the country, and have so little reference to the existing establishment, that, if the army were reduced to a single regiment, no reduction could safely be made in either of them. To form a correct estimate of the duties of the other branches of the staff, and, consequently, the number of officers required, we must take into consideration not only the number of troops, but, what is equally essential, the number of posts and extent of country which they occupy. Were our Military Establishment reduced one-half, it is obvious that, if the same posts continued to be occupied, which now are, the same number of officers in the quartermaster's, commissary's, paymaster's, medical, and adjutant and inspector general's departments, would be required.

To compare, then, as is sometimes done, our staff with those of European armies, assembled in large bodies, is manifestly unfair. The act of the last session, it is believed, has made all the reduction which ought to be attempted. It has rendered the staff efficient without making it expensive. Such a staff is not only indispensable to the efficiency of the army, but is also necessary to a proper economy in its disbursements; and should an attempt be made at retrenchment, by reducing the present number, it would, in its consequences, probably prove wasteful and extravagant.

In fact no part of our military organization requires more attention in peace than the general staff. It is, in every service, invariably the last in attaining perfection; and, if neglected in peace, when there is leisure, it will be impossible, in the midst of the hurry and bustle of war, to bring it to perfection. It is in peace that it should receive a perfect organization, and that the officers should be trained to method and punctuality, so that, at the commencement of a war, instead of creating anew, nothing more should be necessary than to give to it the necessary enlargement. In this country, particularly, the staff cannot be neglected with impunity. As difficult as its operations are, in actual service, everywhere, it has here to encounter great and peculiar impediments, from the extent of the country, the badness, and frequently the want of roads, and the sudden and unexpected calls which are often made on the militia. If it could be shown that the staff, in its present extent, was not necessary in peace, it would, with the view taken, be unwise to lop off any of its branches, which would be necessary in actual service. With a defective staff, we must carry on our military operations under great disadvantages, and be exposed, particularly at the commencement of a war, to great losses, embarrassments, and disasters.

As intimately connected with this part of the subject, it is proper to observe, that so many and such distant small posts as our service requires, not only adds to the expense of the Army, by rendering a more numerous staff necessary, but it increases the price of almost every article of supply, and the difficulty of enforcing a proper responsibility and economy. To an Army thus situated, the expenses and losses resulting from transportation alone constitutes a considerable sum. Under the best management, our Army must be more expensive, even were our supplies equally cheap, than European armies collected in large bodies, in the midst of populous and wealthy communities. These observations are not made to justify an improper management, or to divert the attention of the House from so important a subject, as the expense of our Military Establishment. They, in fact, ought to have an opposite effect; for, just in the same proportion that it is liable to be expensive, ought the attention and effort of the Government to be roused to confine its expenses within the most moderate limits which may be practicable.

The next question which presents itself for consideration is, can the expenses of our Military Establishment be reduced, without injury to the public service, by reducing the pay and emoluments of the officers and soldiers? There is no class in the community whose compensation has advanced less, since the termination of the war of the Revolution, than that of the officers and soldiers of our Army. While money has depreciated more rapidly than at any other period, and the price of all of the necessities of life has advanced proportionably, their compensation has remained nearly stationary. The effects are severely felt by the subaltern officers. It requires the most rigid economy for them to subsist on their pay and emoluments. Documents marked F and G exhibit the pay and subsistence during the Revolution, and as at present established; and document marked H exhibits the allowance of clothing, fuel, forage, transportation, quarters, waiters, stationery, and straw, at the termination of the Revolutionary war, and in 1802, 1816, and 1818. By a reference to those documents, it will be seen that, under most of the heads, the variation of the different periods has been very small; and that, on a comparison of the whole, the pay of an officer is not near equal now, if allowance is made for the depreciation of money, to what it was during the Revolution. I will abstain from further remarks, as it must be obvious from these statements that the expense of our Military Establishment cannot be materially reduced, without injury to the public service, by reducing the pay and emoluments of the officers and soldiers.

It only remains to consider, in relation to this part of the resolution of the House, whether the expense of our Military Establishment can be reduced by a proper attention to its administration, or by a more rigid enforcement of responsibility and economy. Our Military Establishment is doubtless susceptible of great improvement in its administration. The field is extensive, and the attention of the Government has not heretofore been so strongly directed towards it, as its importance deserves. Here all savings are real gain, not only in a moneyed, but in a moral and political point of view. An inefficient administration, without economy or responsibility, not only exhausts the public resources, but strongly tends to contaminate the moral and political principles of the officers who are charged with the disbursements of the Army. To introduce, however, a high state of economy and responsibility in the management of a subject so extensive and complicated as our Military Establishment, is a task of great difficulty, and requires not only a perfect organization of the department charged with it, but a continued energetic and judicious enforcement of the laws and regulations established for its government. The organization is the proper sphere of legislation, as the application of the laws and regulations is that of administration. The former has done all, or nearly all, that can be done. It is believed that the organization of the War Department, as well as the general staff of the Army, is not susceptible of much improvement. The act of the last session regulating the staff has not only made important savings in the expenses of the Army, but has given both to the department and the staff a much more efficient organization than they ever before had. Every department of the Army charged with disbursements has now a proper head, who, under the laws and regulations, is responsible for its administration. The head of the department is thus freed from detail, and has leisure to inspect and control the whole of the disbursements. Much time and reflection will be required to bring the system into complete operation, and to derive from it all the advantages which ought to be expected. The extent of the saving which may result from it can only be ascertained by time and experience; but, with an attentive and vigorous administration, it doubtless will be considerable. In war it will be much more difficult to enforce economy and responsibility; but with a system well organized, and with officers trained to method and punctuality, much of the waste and frauds which would otherwise take place in war, will be prevented. In peace there can be no insuperable difficulty in attaining a high degree of responsibility and economy. The mere moneyed responsibility, or that of purchases and disbursements, will be easily enforced. The public now sustains much greater losses in the waste and improper use of public property, than in its moneyed transactions. In our Military Establishment, responsibility in the latter is well checked, and not badly enforced. The accounts are rendered with considerable punctuality, and are promptly settled; and even neglect or misapplication of public funds, by the disbursing officers, are not often accompanied with ultimate losses, as they are under bonds for the faithful discharge of their duties. Accountability, as it regards the public property, is much more difficult, and has heretofore been much less complete. Returns of property in many cases, particularly in the medical department, have rarely been required; and even where they have been, they have not been made with punctuality. It cannot be doubted but what the public has sustained very considerable damage from this want of accountability. Every article of public property, even the smallest, ought, if possible, to be in charge of some person who should be responsible for it. It will be difficult to attain this degree of perfection; but it is hoped, by making each of the subordinate departments of the War Department liable for the property in its charge, a very considerable improvement and reduction of expenses will be made.

On the quality of the ration, and the system of supplying and issuing it, which I propose next to consider, the health, comfort, and efficiency of the Army mainly depend. Too much care cannot be bestowed on these important subjects; for, let the military system be ever so perfect in other particulars, any considerable deficiency in these must, in all great military operations, expose an army to the greatest disasters. All human efforts must, of necessity, be limited by the means of sustenance. Food sustains the immense machinery of war, and gives the impulse to all its operations; and if this essential be withdrawn, even for a few days, the whole must cease to act. No absolute standard can be fixed, as it regards either the quantity or quality of the rations. These must vary, according to the habits and products of different countries. The great objects are, first and mainly, to sustain the health and spirit of the troops; and the next, to do it with the least possible expense. The system which effects these in the greatest degree, is the most perfect. The ration, as established by the act of the 16th of March, 1802, experience proves to be ample in quantity, but not of the quality best calculated to secure either health or economy. It consists of eighteen ounces of bread, or flour, one pound and a quarter of beef, or three-quarters of a pound of pork, one gill of rum, brandy, or whiskey, and at the rate of two quarts of salt, four quarts of vinegar, four pounds of soap, and one pound and a half of candles to every hundred rations.

The objections to it in relation to the health of the Army, are fully stated in a report of the Surgeon General to the War Department, (marked I,) which I would respectfully annex as a part of this report. Under this view of the subject more need not be added, except to urge its importance, both on the score of humanity and policy.

Our people, even the poorest, being accustomed to a plentiful mode of living, require, to preserve their health, a continuation, in a considerable degree, of the same habits of life, in a camp; and a sudden and great departure from it subjects them, as is proved by experience, to great mortality. Our losses, in the late and Revolutionary wars, from this cause, were probably much greater than from the sword. However well qualified for war in other respects, in the mere capacity of bearing privations, we are inferior to most nations. An American would starve on what a Tartar would live on with comfort. In fact, barbarous and oppressed nations have, in this particular, a striking advantage, which, however, ought to be much more than compensated by the skill and resources of a free and civilized people. If, however, such a people want the skill and spirit to direct its resources to its defence, the very wealth by which it ought to defend itself becomes the motive for invasion and conquest. Besides, there is something shocking to the feelings, that, in a country of plenty beyond all others, in a country which ordinarily is so careful of the happiness and life of the meanest of its citizens, its brave defenders, who are not only ready, but anxious, to expose their lives for the safety and glory of their country, should, through a defective system of supply, be permitted almost to starve, or to perish by the poison of unwholesome food, as has frequently been the case. If it could be supposed that these considerations are not sufficient to excite the most anxious care on this subject, we ought to remember that nothing adds more to the expense of military operations, or exposes more to its disasters, than the sickness and mortality which result from defective or unwholesome supplies. Impressed with this view of the subject, considerable changes have been made in the ration under the authority of the 8th section of the act regulating the staff of the Army, passed at the last session of Congress. The vegetable part of the ration has been much increased. Twice a week, a half allowance of meat, with a suitable quantity of peas or beans, is directed to be issued. Fresh meat has also been substituted, twice a week, for salted. In the southern division, bacon and kiln-dried Indian corn meal have been, to a certain extent, substituted for pork and wheat flour. In addition, orders have been given, at all the permanent posts, where it can be done, to cultivate a sufficient supply of ordinary garden vegetables for the use of the troops; and, at the posts remote from the settled parts of the country, the order is extended to the cultivation of corn, and to the supply of the meat part of the ration, both to avoid the expense of distant and expensive transportation, and to secure, at all times, a supply within the posts themselves.

In addition to these changes, I am of opinion the spirit part of the ration, as a regular issue, ought to be dispensed with; and such appears to be the opinion of most of the officers of the Army. It both produces and perpetuates habits of intemperance, destructive alike to the health and moral and physical energy of the soldiers. The spirits ought to be placed in depot, and be issued occasionally, under the discretion of the commanders. Thus used, its noxious effects would be avoided, and the troops, when great efforts were necessary, would, by a judicious use, derive important benefits from it. Molasses, beer, and cider, according to circumstances, might be used as substitutes. The substitution of bacon and kiln-dried corn meal, in the southern division, will have, it is believed, valuable effects. They are both much more congenial to the habits of the people in that section of our country. Corn meal has another, and, in my opinion, great and almost decisive advantage; it requires so little art to prepare it for use. It is not easy to make good bread of wheat flour, while it is almost impossible to make bad of that of Indian corn. Besides, wheat is much more liable to be damaged than the Indian corn, for the latter is better protected against disease and the effects of bad seasons in time of harvest than any other grain; and, when injured, the good is easily separated from the bad. Experience proves it to be not less nutritious than wheat or any other grain. Parched corn constitutes the principal food of an Indian warrior; and such are its nutritious qualities, that they can support long and fatiguing marches on it alone.

I next proceed to consider the system of supplying the Army with provisions, or the establishment of a commissariat, and as they are connected in their nature, I propose to consider that part of the resolution in relation to a commissariat, and the mode of issuing the rations, at the same time.

The system established, at the last session, will, in time of peace, be adequate to the cheap and certain supply of the army. The act provides for the appointment of a commissary general, and as many assistants as the service may require, and authorizes the President to assign to them their duties in purchasing and issuing rations. It also directs that the ordinary supplies of the army should be purchased on contracts to be made by the commissary general, and to be delivered, on inspection, in the bulk, at such places as shall be stipulated in the contract. Document marked J contains the rules and regulations which have been established by order of the President, and presents the operation of the system in detail. It is believed that it is as well guarded against fraud as any other department of our military supplies; and, judging from the contracts already formed under it, will, when improved by experience, probably make a very considerable saving. It would improve the system, to authorize the appointment of two deputy commissaries, one for each division, with the pay, rank, and emoluments, of major of infantry, to be taken from the line or from citizens, and so to amend the act of the last session as to authorize the President to appoint the assistant commissaries, either from the line or citizens. When the assistant commissary is not taken from the line, to make his pay equal to that of a subaltern appointed from the line, it ought to be $56 per month, with two rations a day. It should be the duty of the deputy commissaries to perform such service as the commissary general might prescribe, and particularly to inspect the principal depots, and, in cases of necessity, to make the necessary purchases. When a suitable subaltern cannot be had, or when his services are necessary in the line, the power proposed to be vested in the President, to select from citizens, would be important. It is not believed that any other alteration would be necessary in peace; but the system would require great enlargement in war to render it sufficiently energetic to meet the many vicissitudes incidental to the operations of war.

It would then be necessary to divide the system into two divisions, one for purchasing and the other for issuing of rations, with as many deputy commissaries of purchases and issues as there may be armies and military districts, to whom ought to be added a suitable number of assistants. The basis of the system ought, in war, to be the same as is now established. The ordinary supplies ought to be by contract on public proposals. By a judicious collection of provisions at proper depots, combined with an active and energetic system of transportation, it would be seldom necessary to resort to any other mode of purchasing. To provide, however, for contingencies, the purchasing department ought to be efficiently organized, and a branch of it, as already stated, attached to each army and military department. As it is the means to be resorted to in cases of necessity, it ought to possess those high and discretionary powers which do not admit of exact control. It is in its nature liable to many abuses, and, to prevent them from being great, more efficient regulations and checks are required than in any other branch of the general staff.

The defects of the mere contract system are so universally acknowledged by those who have experienced its operation in the late war, that it cannot be necessary to make many observations in relation to it. Nothing can appear more absurd, than that the success of the most important military relations, on which the very fate of the country may depend, should ultimately rest on men who are subject to no military responsibility, and on whom there is no other hold than the penalty of a bond. When we add to this observation that it is often the interest of a contractor to fail, at the most critical juncture, when the means of supply become the most expensive, it seems strange that the system should have been continued for a single campaign. It may be said, that, when the contractor fails, the commander has a right to purchase at his risk, by which the disasters, which naturally result from a failure, may be avoided. The observation is more specious than solid. If on failure of the contractor there existed a well organized system for purchasing the supplies, there would be some truth in it: but, without such a system, without depots of provisions, and with the funds intended for the supply of the Army, perhaps, in the hands of the contractor, his failure must generally be fatal to a campaign. It is believed that a well organized commissariat, whose ordinary supplies are obtained by contract founded on public notice, possesses (besides those peculiar to itself) all the advantages fairly attributable to the system of issuing rations by contract. It is equally guarded against fraud, and its purchases can be made on terms more advantageous. A considerable objection to the system of issuing the ration by contract, is, that the merchants and capitalists are deterred from bidding, by the hazard of issuing the ration; and thus the sphere of competition is contracted, and the contracts for supplying the Army often thrown into the hands of adventurers. This objection is avoided under the present system, by which the nation will be cheaply supplied, and the danger of failure almost wholly removed. All of which is respectfully submitted.

RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.

Mr. HOPKINSON then called up the resolution which he yesterday submitted, calling on the President for certain documents connected with our relations with Spain.

The SPEAKER suggested that the Message just received probably embraced the correspondence the gentleman had in view, by his own motion.

Mr. HOPKINSON intimated that he believed it did not.

Mr. HOLMES proposed to modify the resolution, in a manner which he thought would meet the object of the gentleman, and be free from any objection, so as to read as follows:

"That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this House such further correspondence and proceedings in relation to our affairs with Spain, as in his opinion it shall not be inconsistent with the public interest to divulge."

Mr. HOPKINSON accepted this modification.

Mr. HOLMES then said he was in favor of the resolution. He should not go into a detail of the particular reasons why he was in favor of the motion; but the Committee of Foreign Relations had thought a call of this kind to be necessary, and he hoped the House would grant it.

The resolve was agreed to, nem. con., and a committee appointed to present the resolution to the President.

EXTENSION OF MILITIA PENSIONS.

The engrossed bill authorizing the extension of the pensions to the widows and orphans of the militia who fell in battle or died in service during the late war, for five years longer, was read a third time.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made some remarks, rather of an explanatory than argumentative nature, on the subject of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, conceiving the discrimination between the families of the militia and of the regulars, in the proposed extension, to be unjust, moved to recommit the bill to the committee who reported it, with instructions to report an amendment, embracing in the extension the provisions of the 2d section of the act of April, 1816.

This motion gave rise to some debate, in which Messrs. T. M. NELSON, and HARRISON opposed it, as calculated, by overloading the bill, to break it down; Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, RICH, and PITKIN, supported it, as consistent with the principles of equity, which, in their administration, ought to know no distinction of persons.

Before the question on the pending motion was taken, a motion was made by Mr. WHITMAN to lay the bill on the table, and negatived.

Mr. PITKIN then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely.

This question was taken by yeas and nays—for the motion 79, against it 79, as follows:

So the said bill was passed.

The remainder of the day was occupied on the following bills:

A bill to incorporate a company to build a bridge over the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, from the southern extremity of Eleventh street east, in the City of Washington.

A bill for the relief of Thomas B. Farish.

A bill for the relief of Samuel H. Harper.

Which severally passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The House then, on motion, adjourned until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Matthew Barrow," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill, allowing to each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, in the Army of the United States, who were on furlough at the close of the late war with Great Britain, a bounty in land, as in other cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, reported a bill granting a donation of land to the State of Illinois for the seat of government of said State; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the petition of Captain Stanton Sholes; which was read; when Mr. J. reported a bill for the relief of the said Captain Stanton Sholes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON also made a report on the petition of Harvey Wakefield; which was read; when Mr. J. reported a bill for the relief of the said Harvey Wakefield; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON also reported a bill providing for the payment of property lost and destroyed in the Seminole war; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of public lands sold in the Alabama Territory, and the amount paid to receivers, and the balance due by individuals; rendered in obedience to a resolution of this House, of the 3d instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PITKIN was excused from a further service on the joint committee appointed upon the subject of the printing, ordered by the respective Houses of Congress, and Mr. SEYBERT was appointed of the said committee.

Mr. TARR submitted the following resolution, which was read and rejected by the House—ayes 55, noes 54:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the sum of — dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in further completing that part of the turnpike road lying between Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, and Wheeling, in the State of Virginia; and pledging for the repayment thereof the two per cent. fund arising from the sales of the public lands northwest of the river Ohio.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for allowing an equal bounty in land, as other soldiers, to all minors who enlisted in the army of the United States in the late war, and continued in service until peace was concluded and were regularly discharged.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to lay before the House of Representatives a statement of the tracts of land reserved for the establishment of towns in the Alabama Territory, specifying the price at which said lands have been sold, and such other information as may be in his possession relative to said reservations.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Thomas B. Farish; the engrossed bill for the relief of Samuel H. Harper; and the engrossed bill for the incorporation of a company for making a bridge across the Eastern Branch, from between Eleventh and Twelfth streets, in Washington city, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The House having proceeded to the orders of the day—

The bill providing for the payment of certain bills drawn by General Armstrong in favor of the William Morgan, &c., under the treaty with France, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and being explained and supported by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Mattrom Ball, of the Northern Neck of Virginia, allowing him fourteen hundred dollars for a house destroyed by the British during the war, in consequence of its having been occupied by our troops, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

IRISH SETTLERS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. CLAGETT submitted the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to designate and set apart — townships, each of six miles square, in the State of Illinois, east of the military bounty lands, each alternate section thereof to be settled by emigrants from Ireland, and sold to them at two dollars per acre, to be paid by three instalments, as follows, to wit: one-third part thereof, at the end of four years; one other third part thereof, at the end of eight years; and the residue thereof, at the end of twelve years from the day of sale, with interest on the said several sums: Provided,

First. That the said Secretary of the Treasury may, and it shall be his duty to, reject all applications of such emigrants, for the lands aforesaid; unless the applicants shall have been satisfactorily recommended as moral and industrious men.

Secondly. That no contract shall be made with any emigrant as aforesaid, unless he engage to improve at least twenty of each hundred acres, to be transferred as aforesaid; and also to erect a suitable dwelling-house and barn thereon.

Thirdly. That no contract shall be binding upon the United States, nor title vest in any emigrant settler, until he shall have made the settlement and improvements aforesaid, and fully paid for the lands contracted for as aforesaid.

Fourthly. That no such contract shall be made, nor a patent issued to any one settler or his heirs, for more than — acres of land.

Fifthly. That in every instance, where the conditions of settlement, improvement, or payment, shall not have been fully complied with, at the expiration of the term of twelve years from the date of such contract, the said premises so forfeited shall revert to the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the same to be sold for the benefit of the said United States: Provided, nevertheless, That in all cases where payment in part shall have been made, the sum or sums so paid, shall be refunded to such emigrant, or his heirs.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed and instructed to prepare and report a bill, embracing the subject matter, and in pursuance of, the foregoing first resolution.

The question was then taken. Will the House now proceed to consider the said resolution? and determined in the negative by a large majority.

MISSOURI—TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a separate territorial government in that part of the new Territory of Missouri, lying south of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude, which is called the Arkansas country, and which is not included in the proposed boundary of the projected State of Missouri, by the bill now before the House, for the purpose of establishing a State government in part of the Territory of Missouri, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. R. explained briefly the object of his motion. There being every reason to expect that the people of the Territory of Missouri would be authorized, at the present session, to form a constitution of State government, and with certain limited boundaries, the whole Territory being too extensive to be included within one State; that part of the Territory not included within the limits of the State, would of course have occasion for a separate Territorial government, which, as in the case of the admission of Mississippi into the Union, had been done in regard to the Territory of Alabama. But, if his expectation was disappointed, and an act should not pass at the present session to authorize the people of Missouri to form a State government, it was yet necessary that a separate Territorial government should be established. This Territory, which was likely to become in time one of the most populous Territories in the Union, was, from its remoteness from the present seat of Government, almost without either law or government.

Mr. SCOTT, of Missouri, said he did not rise to oppose the resolution; on the contrary, had he a vote to give, it would be for its adoption. He was not sensible that any remarks he was capable of making would have any influence on the vote of the House, but he rose lest his silence might be construed into an opposition, which he did not intend; and to repel any inference that might be drawn that he had neglected his duty to a part of his constituents, in not being the mover of the proposition. He had intended to introduce a resolution of a similar character, so soon as he should receive from the Legislature of the Territory a memorial praying for the erection of a State in the northern section of the Territory, together with a certified copy of the census of the whole Territory, which he was in the daily expectation of receiving. This data had not yet arrived, and he felt a reluctance, in the press of business before the House, to present, voluntarily, a proposition, even for the consideration of the House, without having good authority, or some leading reason to justify him. He knew, however, that the situation of that portion of the Territory, removed four or five hundred miles from the seat of Territorial government, called loudly for the interposition of the General Government. They were not unfrequently without a competency of civil and military officers to administer justice, or keep order in the country; and although he was not in possession of the census of the Territory, or any petition from the people of that part of it, yet he was convinced that the quantity of the population, and its respectability, justified the request; and believing, as he did, that it was the wish of the people, and knowing it was their interest, he hoped the House would not consider the resolution premature, but that it would be adopted.

The motion was then agreed to, without opposition; and Messrs. ROBERTSON, BEECHER, and JONES, were appointed the said committee.

PASSENGER SHIPS.

The bill to regulate passenger ships and vessels came next in order.

Mr. NEWTON explained the necessity of this bill and the nature of its provisions. The great object of it was, he said, to give to those who go and come in passenger vessels, a security of sufficient food and convenience. In consequence of the anxiety to emigrate from Europe to this country, the captains, sure of a freight, were careless of taking the necessary quantity of provisions, or of restricting the number of passengers to the convenience which their ships afforded. To show how necessary such a bill as this had become, one or two facts would suffice. In the year 1817, five thousand persons had sailed for this country from Antwerp, &c., of whom one thousand died on the passage. In one instance a captain had sailed from a port on that coast with one thousand two hundred and sixty-seven passengers. On his voyage he put into the Texel, previous to doing which four hundred had died. After being on the passage to our shores, before the vessel arrived at Philadelphia, three hundred more had died. The remainder, when the vessel reached Newcastle, were in a very emaciated state from the want of water and food, from which many of them afterwards died. Many other cases might be stated, but these would suffice to show the absolute necessity of provisions such as those of this bill. The bill restricted the number of passengers to two for every five tons' burden of the vessel. In Great Britain, formerly, but one had been allowed to every five tons; but now, one to every three tons. The committee had been of opinion that the scale of one to every two tons and a half would afford every necessary accommodation. With regard to the other sections of the bill, they were generally similar to those of the act respecting seamen, by which a captain is obliged to take on board a certain quantity of water and bread for each seaman employed.

No objection being made to the bill, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill regulating pensions next passed through the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. T. M. NELSON stated the object of the bill to be to protect the Government from imposition. He knew of many men receiving pensions for wounds received in the late war, who had wholly recovered of those wounds, and were as hale, hearty men as any in the community, &c.

After some debate between Messrs. NELSON and MILLS, respecting an amendment proposed by the former, and an unsuccessful motion by Mr. W. P. MACLAY to recommit the bill, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, December 17.

Another member, to wit: from South Carolina, STEPHEN D. MILLER, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill concerning the marshal and district attorney of the western district of Pennsylvania, and the clerk of the eastern district of said State; which was read the first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him by HEMAN ALLEN, containing a notification of the resignation of his seat in this House, as one of the representatives from the State of Vermont, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, be appointed of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, in the place of Mr. ALLEN, resigned.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting statements rendered in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 4th of April last, in relation to the expenditure of the several appropriations heretofore made, to reward the officers and crews of certain public armed vessels for captures made by them during the late war with Great Britain, which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to communicate to this House a copy of the instructions given by him under the eighth section of the act of the 21st of April, 1806, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans and district of Louisiana,' to the several boards of commissioners, appointed under the act of the 2d of March, 1805, for the ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the aforesaid Territories."

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of lost Treasury notes.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act to enable the people of the Indiana Territory to form a constitution and State government as to authorize the selection of lands granted to the State, for the purpose of fixing their seat of government, in quarter sections and fractions, or parts of fractions, and, if necessary, in contiguous townships, as the Legislature of the State may direct.

On motion of Mr. SILBEE, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing goods on which the duty has been paid to be transported coastwise, to one or more districts within the United States, without loss of debenture.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire whether any, and what, further powers are necessary to enable the accounting officers of the United States, to settle and adjust accounts of long standing, where, from loss of vouchers or other known cause, no additional evidence can be expected.

The engrossed bill for regulating payments to military pensioners was read a third time.

Mr. RICH moved to recommit the bill, with a view to amend it so as to reconcile some of its provisions with existing laws on the subject of pensions, with which, he thought, as the bill now stood, they were inconsistent.

Mr. TAYLOR seconded the motion, and stated particular cases of exceptions to any general provisions on this subject, which appeared to him to require a revision of this bill.

The question was then taken on recommitment, and decided in the affirmative.

The engrossed bill to regulate passenger ships and vessels; the engrossed bill directing the payment of certain bills drawn by General Armstrong in favor of William Morgan; and the engrossed bill for the relief of Dr. Mattrom Ball, were severally read a third time, and passed.

Mr. LITTLE, from the joint committee, on the subject of the public printing, made report, which was read and the resolution therein contained, was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That when any printing is done, by virtue of a joint rule or resolution of the two Houses, the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, jointly, and when ordered by either House, the Secretary and Clerk respectively, be authorized and required to employ such printer or printers as will most expedite its execution and delivery, and allow him or them the same prices now allowed to the printer employed by the said Secretary and Clerk, giving the latter the preference, when it be praclicable for him to execute and deliver it as soon as it can be done by any other printer or printers.

CASE OF GILES KELLOGG.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Giles Kellogg.

This is a case in which Captain Kellogg, with a company of volunteers, entered the service of the United States, on the New York frontier, and, in the course of the campaign of 1812-13, sustained losses of clothing, &c., by consequence of a precipitate retreat ordered by Colonel Forsyth, on the invasion of Ogdensburg, in February, 1813, and by a subsequent retreat from Horse Island, in May, 1813. This clothing being their private property, they claim indemnification for its loss. The Committee of Claims report that, according to the practice of the Government, the petitioners are not entitled to relief; and, for a case in point, refer to the case of Commodore Barney's flotilla men, to whom Congress refused indemnification for the loss of clothing, occasioned by blowing up the flotilla in the Patuxent, by order of the commanding officer.

Mr. LAWYER, of New York, moved to reverse this report, and supported his motion by a long argument, founded on the general principles of equity, and supported by analogies derived from other cases, in which Congress had made indemnifications for losses of private property, occasioned by the operations of war. The private property of these volunteers, he argued, did not become public property by their volunteering their services, in the trying period, in defence of their country; and the loss of it being occasioned by the orders of officers under whose command they were placed, and by no fault of theirs, but rather from a devotion to duty, ought to be compensated by the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS, as chairman of the Committee of Claims, defended the report. Whatever Congress might think proper to do in such a case, from motives of generosity, the petitioner and his company had no claim, either in law or equity, on the Government of the United States. To sustain this position, Mr. W. entered into an argument on the principle and the laws of the case. Mr. W. also objected to the evidence in this case, and deprecated the number of claims of this description pressed upon the consideration of Congress, without any better foundation than the wishes of the petitioners.

After some further remarks from Messrs. STORRS, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and LAWYER, the question was taken on the motion to reverse the report, and decided in the negative—yeas 43.

The Committee having reported its decision to the House, affirming the report—after an unsuccessful motion to recommit the report to the Committee of Claims (negated, 65 to 63) the question was proposed on concurring in the report.

Mr. STORRS spoke against the report, and contended, in the course of his argument, that, without appealing at all to the generosity of Congress, this claim was fully sustained on the principles of justice.

Mr. LIVERMORE and Mr. TERRY also spoke on the subject; when the question was taken, and the report finally concurred in.

FRIDAY, December 18.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Missouri, in the name and on behalf of the people of the said Territory, praying that they may be permitted to form a constitution and State government, with the boundaries described in said petition; and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.—Referred.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Bickley and of Catharine Clark, administratrix of John Clark, deceased; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH also reported a bill, making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1819; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A motion was made by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, that the House reconsider the vote taken yesterday, to concur in the resolution contained in the report made by the joint committee on the public printing; and the question being taken to reconsider the said vote, it passed in the affirmative, and the report was recommitted to the committee by which the same was made.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill relating to duties on foreign merchandise, were discharged, and the said bill was postponed indefinitely.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Baker, and the legal representatives of Peter Trouillet, and on the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Alexander Montgomery, deceased.

The Committee had leave to sit again on the first mentioned bill, and reported the last without amendment, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting sundry statements relative to the internal duties and direct tax, as required by the 33d section of the act of the 22d July, 1813; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, another letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of lands sold northwest of the river Ohio, the purchase money of which has not been fully paid, and of moneys received for said lands, and of the sums now due, together with a description of bank paper, which has been received and is still receivable for the same; which was also ordered to lie on the table.

MASSACHUSETTS' CLAIM.

The SPEAKER having called over, among the orders of the day, the bill providing for the payment of the claim of the State of Massachusetts, for expenses incurred by her militia during the late war—

Mr. MASON, of Massachusetts, rose, and begged the indulgence of the House, that the order of the day might be passed for the present. He made this motion at the request of the gentlemen composing the delegation from the State of Massachusetts, who had been instructed respecting the claim. The Legislature of the State would be in session early in the month of January next, and the delegation were desirous of receiving further documents and communications relative to the claim prior to its discussion; but he hoped that, in the course of the session, the subject might be brought up, and receive a full and fair discussion.

Mr. MILLS, of Massachusetts, made a few remarks to the same effect.

Mr. FOLGER, of Massachusetts, however, moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject.

And the question being taken on that motion, the House decided as follows: For going into committee 73, against it 63.

The House having accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and the bill having been read through—

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) rose to make a motion that the Committee should rise. He was persuaded, he said, that the House could not have heard what had been stated by the honorable gentleman (Mr. MASON) who was chairman of the committee which had reported this bill, or it would, on the present occasion, have exercised the courtesy usually shown to every chairman of a committee who reports a bill, of choosing his own time for calling it up. It might be proper for him to state, Mr. C. said, that his opinion on this subject did not differ, probably, from that of those gentlemen who had chosen to go into committee on the subject. But the chairman having stated to the House that, on a consultation of the delegation of the State, it had been thought proper not now to go into a Committee of the Whole on the subject; that he wished to have further communication with the government of the State on the subject; and that he hoped, in the course of the session, to bring the subject fully and fairly before the House, he thought it hardly possible, had his remarks been heard, that the discussion of the subject would be pressed against his wishes. With regard to the merits of this claim, Mr. C. continued, he would only say, that when the facts were all before the House, and the question open for discussion, gentlemen would find him as decided in his opinion, and as firm in maintaining it, as any other opponent of the claim. But, he said, a certain degree of liberality, of courtesy, of calm deliberation on this subject, was due from the House, no less to itself than to the State whose claims were the subject of consideration.

He hoped, when gentlemen were ready, however, they would enter into a full and fair discussion of the question. Holding the opinions he did, he should not fail to express them at a proper opportunity. But, if the discussion were now to proceed, and the question to be decided, gentlemen would have an occasion for saying that they were hurried into the discussion; that they were taken by surprise; they might, if he were allowed to introduce a forensic term to explain his meaning, say that the decision of the House was a snap judgment, rendered without an examination of evidence, or time given, &c. He hoped, therefore, the Committee might rise, to give the gentlemen in favor of the claim time to prepare themselves for the discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, said that he had voted for going into Committee on this subject, under the impression that it was the wish of the gentlemen who were in favor of the claim to have an investigation into its merits. But, not having heard the remarks of the gentleman who reported the bill, and the Speaker having now stated them, he had no hesitation in voting for the Committee to rise. He wished the question should not be settled until every species of proof on the subject was in possession of the House, because he wished the decision should be such as, when made, should be satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. TALLMADGE, of New York, said, as he had been a member of the committee who reported this bill, and had voted to proceed in the discussion, he thought it proper to rise on this occasion, lest, if silent, his views might be misconceived. With respect to the courtesy due to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and to the State he represented, Mr. T. said he entirely reciprocated the sentiments of the honorable Speaker. But, as the report of the committee in this case, if not acted on at the present session, might, and perhaps would, be adduced hereafter as an argument in favor of the claim; and, as he thought it probable this subject would not again come before the House at the present session, he should take this opportunity to state, that the report made on this subject by the committee was considered as a statement of the case in behalf of Massachusetts, drawn up by herself, as it was in fact by her agent. The committee had thought it a liberality due to a State, appearing as a petitioner before this House, to leave it to her agent, or immediate representative, to make a statement of her own case, in her own way. On the question in committee to accept that report, Mr. S. said, there was a minority; and he, for one, took this occasion to say that, had the discussion of this claim now gone on, and if it should recur at the present session, there was a variety of collateral documents relating to the history and merit of these claims, which he was ready and felt it his duty to urge in argument in opposition to allowing them. Desiring, however, to cultivate harmony in the Union, by treating every State in it with due respect, he did not wish to press the discussion now. Taking this opportunity, then, as the only one he might ever have, to protest against the report of the committee accompanying this bill being considered as the deliberate opinion of the committee, or hereafter brought in as an argument in favor of the claim, being in fact the most favorable statement that a party interested could make of it, he was, for the reason before assigned, in favor of the Committee's rising.

The question was then taken on the Committee's rising, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, in order to insure to this question a consideration during the present session, proposed that the Committee should be refused leave to sit again, and that the bill should be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which, always having preference of other orders of the day, would insure its being taken up whenever desired by the friends of the claim.

Mr. ORR, of Massachusetts, objected to this course, as it would subject the House to the same inconvenience as they had just experienced; that of being called upon to act on the subject before the delegation might be prepared to take it up, &c.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, objected to it for a different reason. If referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it would be made the order of the day for every day, and might be called up and decided when scarce half the House was present.

On the question, leave was given to the Committee to sit again on the bill.

THADDEUS MAYHEW.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew, and the accompanying report of the Committee of Claims.

The claim of the petitioner in this case is for property used, lost, and destroyed by the British army, in consequence of the same being used as barracks, and for places of military deposit by the United States troops, to the amount of fifteen thousand eight hundred ninety-eight dollars. The committee say they believe the Government not bound to remunerate the petitioner; and, if it were considered so bound, would have protested against the extravagance of the charges. The committee report against the whole claim, therefore, with the exception of the sum of $1,298 for beds, bedding, and other furniture taken for the use of the United States troops, and taken or destroyed by them. For the payment of this amount, the committee report a bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill so as to allow to Mr. Mayhew the whole amount of his claim; and supported his motion by an argument, on the principles and facts of the case, of considerable length.

An extended and able debate took place on this motion, in the course of which it was supported by Messrs. POINDEXTER, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, BALDWIN, SMITH, of Maryland, and BUTLER, and opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS and MCCOY.

The debate resulted in agreeing to the motion of Mr. BUTLER; and, thus amended, the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. POINDEXTER introduced a joint resolve for an adjournment from Monday next to Monday week; which was negatived; and the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 21.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, SOLOMON STRONG, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented a petition of Hanson Catlett, a surgeon in the Army of the United States, praying compensation for a negro slave, who was drowned while attending him as a servant, during the late war with Great Britain.—Referred.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the committee appointed on the 10th instant, reported a bill to provide for taking the fourth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MARCHAND, from the committee appointed on the petition of John Wells, made a report, which was read; when Mr. M. reported a bill for the relief of the said John Wells, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Military Committee, reported a bill "concerning the Military Establishment of the United States." [This bill proposes a modification of parts of the staff of the Army, without reducing it.]

The bill was twice read, and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the same committee, made a report on the petition of Patrick Callan, which was read; when Mr. J. reported a bill for the relief of the said Patrick Callan, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Joseph Wheaton.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the select committee appointed on that subject, reported a bill establishing a separate Territorial government for the southern part of the Territory of Missouri; which was twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the several laws, to prevent waste and damage on the public lands, by cutting timber thereon.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements of the sales of public lands, during the year 1817, and the three first quarters of the year 1818, which were intended to have accompanied the annual report on the state of the finances; which was ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Montgomery, deceased," was read the third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew was read a third time.

Mr. STORRS, on the ground that the evidence establishing the value of some of the articles destroyed was defective, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Claims to re-investigate that point.

After a long debate the motion was agreed to, and the bill recommitted.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General John Stark," with amendments. They have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within the State of Illinois;" and "An act for the relief of Louis and Antoine Dequindre;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General John Stark," were read and concurred in by the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens, Lucretia Stevens, late Lucretia Sands, and others; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again thereon.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1819.

The bill includes the following items:

Contingent expenses	18,600 00

The bill was then reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Renner and Heath.

The claim of the petitioners in this case is for the destruction of their ropewalk and its contents, in consequence of the walk having been employed in the manufacture of cordage for the United States, and in consequence of the carts and boats employed for the removal of their property having been pressed by officers of the United States.

The bill was then reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, December 22.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of John James Dufour, on behalf of himself and his associates, stating that a short time past he went to the land office in Cincinnati, for the purpose of completing the payment for the lands lying within the State of Indiana, heretofore purchased by them for the cultivation of the vine; and that the bank paper which he offered would not be received in consequence of an order from the Treasury Department, directing the receiver not to receive anything in payment for lands except specie, or notes of the Bank of the United States; that he is unable to procure either within the time prescribed for the last payment, and that if the money is not paid by the first of January next, the lands will be forfeited to the United States; and praying for an extension of credit for one year from the said first day of January next, or such other relief as Congress may think proper to grant.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

EBEN. STEVENS, AND OTHERS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens, and others.

This claim is of the date of 1785, and is founded on an award of commissioners authorized, by resolutions of Congress, to examine the claims of Tench Francis, Comfort Sands, and others, then late contractors for the moving army, and of Comfort Sands and Co., then late contractors for the post of West Point and its dependencies, for damages sustained by them, from the late Superintendent of Finance having failed to make good the stipulated payments, and from his having withdrawn the contracts. The award was, in 1790, reported by the Auditor of the Treasury to be binding on the United States, to the amount of $33,675 for the first company, and $6,621 for the last mentioned company.

The documents on which this award was founded were also before the House, and were all read through.

When the reading of the documents was finished, the greater part of the day had been consumed. The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

J. J. DUFOUR, AND OTHERS.

Mr. POINDEXTER reported, from the Committee of Public Lands, a bill to extend, for the term of twelve months, the time allowed to J. J. Dufour, and his associates, of Vevay, Indiana, for completing the payment for the lands purchased by them from the United States.

On this bill arose a debate, which wholly occupied the House until the usual hour of adjournment; in the course of which the bill was so amended as to make the extension for six, instead of twelve months.

The debate was more animated than at the first glance one would have expected such a question to produce. The petitioners ask this indulgence, because such money as they have the receiver of public moneys will not take from them. The bill, therefore, was supported on various grounds, on the reasonableness of the request, and on the merit of the petitioners, on whom a high eulogium was pronounced. The bill was opposed on the general ground of the inexpediency of making a discrimination between these claimants and other petitioners. Messrs. POINDEXTER, HARRISON, TAYLOR, HENDRICKS, TRIMBLE, MERCER, and BEECHER, supported the bill, and Messrs. WILLIAMS of N. Carolina, SIMKINS, MILLS, STORRS, MCCOY, SERGEANT, and DESHA, opposed it.

The question on ordering the bill to a third reading having been taken by yeas and nays, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 67, as follows:

On motion of Mr. COBB, it was

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the recorder of land titles in the Territory of Missouri, made in obedience to the act of the 20th of April, 1818, entitled "An act for the relief of James Mackay, of the Missouri Territory;" which was read, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Aquila Giles;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. STROTHER moved that it be laid on the table; which motion was rejected.

The question was then taken, Shall the said bill pass? and determined in the negative—yeas 65, nays 66, as follows:

DECEMBER 28, 1818.

The Message and documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Attorney General of the United States, in relation to the accounts of James Thomas, a quartermaster general in the Army in the late war with Great Britain; which was referred to him, by orders of this House, of the 17th of March, and 10th of April last; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PALMER submitted the following resolution; which was read and rejected, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary to be made to the act, supplementary to the act, to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 20th of April, 1818, in relation to the importation of goods, &c., into the United States, by land, from the dominions of Great Britain in North America; and, also, that the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the fourth section of an act, entitled "An act to continue in force, an act, entitled 'An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 3d day of March, 1815, and for other purposes,' passed the 3d day of March, 1817;" that the provision therein contained shall apply only to steamboats on Lake Champlain, which are employed solely in the transportation of passengers and their baggage; and that the said section shall not extend to authorize the entry of any goods, wares, and merchandise, except passengers' baggage, in any district, other than the one in which the same are to be landed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the mail, by steamboats or otherwise, on navigable waters, in the same manner that he is authorized by law to contract for transportation of the mail by land.

J. J. DUFOUR, AND OTHERS.

Mr. PINDALL, after stating that information had come to his knowledge since the decision of the House, on Thursday last, against the bill for the relief of J. J. Dufour and others, which he thought had a material bearing on the expediency of extending relief, in some shape, to the petitioners, and after entering into some reasons which, from reflection and further investigation, had occurred to him, in support of the motion he rose to make, moved to reconsider the vote which rejected the bill, and to bring it before the House to receive the modification which he thought would entitle it to the sanction of the House.

Mr. LINCOLN, of Mass., spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I place my vote on the broad basis of national policy—the policy of encouraging emigration, and the culture of the vine. When I am told that the inhabitants of the little village of Vevay are the countrymen of the illustrious Tell, that they are planters of the vine, and industrious and virtuous people, delighting in the exercise of the rites of hospitality, I find my sympathy strongly excited; yet I do not suffer that sympathy to delude my understanding. But, should these people write to their friends across the Atlantic, and inform them that they are here, enjoying the patronage and fostering care of our Government, would not those friends, although looking around them, and seeing themselves surrounded by ramparts of mountains, yet, perceiving the avalanches of European power continually tumbling upon their heads, be disposed to abandon a country where their liberties are so insecure, and come to one where they should be assured of an asylum? On the other hand, should they be informed that these persons came to their hard-hearted creditor—that creditor an opulent, powerful nation, and told him that they had been unfortunate, but not guilty; negligent, but not delinquent; yet that he drove them from his door with scorn and contempt, bade them begone, and prepare to pay him the last farthing of their bond at the moment when it should become due, what, then, would be their feelings? They could not be other than those of the deepest aversion and horror. We cannot do too much, sir, to encourage the emigration of a class of population like that of the Cantons of Switzerland, a population remarkably assimilated to that of our own country, in manners, customs, feelings, and principles.

There is yet another argument more weighty than that just urged—I mean that resulting from the policy of encouraging the cultivation of the vine, encouraging it, paradoxical as it may seem, for the purpose of preventing intemperance; for, true it is, that there are no people more temperate than those of France and Switzerland. The reason is, that they make use of the products of their own vineyards, as the substitute for those deleterious ardent spirits which are here consumed to so lamentable an excess. Give then to these people a little indulgence, and you shall see not only the banks of the Ohio festooned by the grape vine, but it shall climb to our mountains tops, and its fruit bask in the sunshine upon all our hills.

Ebenezer Stevens, and Others.

H. OF R.

The question was then taken on reconsidering the vote on the bill, and decided in the affirmative; when, on motion of Mr. PINDALL, the bill was referred to a select committee.

EBENEZER STEVENS, AND OTHERS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens, Lucretia Stevens, late Lucretia Sands, and others—the question to strike out the first section being still under consideration.

Mr. SHERWOOD supported the bill in a speech of considerable length, and very minute investigation. He was followed by Mr. RHEA in opposition to the bill; and, after refusing to strike out the first section, and a little discussion on its details, the bill was filled with the sum of $21,431, with interest from October, 1787, and the bill reported to the House.

The sum with which the blank was filled was agreed to by the House; and, after some further remarks from Mr. RHEA, in opposition to the bill, the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—yeas 63, nays 72, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Baldwin, Ball, Bayley, Beecher, Boden, Boss, Cruger, Cushman, Darlington, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Fuller, Gilbert, Hall of Delaware, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Herbert, Herkimer, Hitchcock, Hopkinson, Hostetter, Hubbard, Huntington, Johnson of Virginia, Kirtland, Lawyer, W. Maclay, Mason of Massachusetts, Mason of Rhode Island, Merrill, Middleton, Samuel Moore, Moseley, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, Nesbitt, Ogden, Ogle, Orr, Palmer, Parrott, Peter, Pitkin, Quarles, Rice, Ruggles, Schuyler, Sergeant, Sherwood, Silsbee, Storrs, Tallmadge, Taylor, Terrell, Terry, Upham, Westerlo, Whitman, Wilkin, and Williams of Connecticut.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson of Kentucky, Bassett, Bateman, Bellinger, Bennett, Bloomfield, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Claiborne, Cobb, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Culbreth, Davidson, Desha, Drake, Earle, Edwards, Folger, Gage, Hale, Hall of North Carolina, Hendricks, Herrick, Hogg, Holmes, Hunter, Jones, Kinsey, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, McLean of Illinois, W. P. Maclay, McCoy, Marchand, Marr, Miller, H. Nelson, Newton, Patterson, Pindall, Pleasants, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Robertson, Sampson, Savage, Sawyer, Scudder, Settle, Seybert, Slocumb, Ballard Smith, Alexander Smyth, J. S. Smith, Southard, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Strother, Tarr, Tompkins, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker of North Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, Wendover Whiteside, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

TUESDAY, December 29.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom had been referred the letter of the Sergeant-at-Arms, respecting the suit commenced against him by John Anderson, reported a resolution authorizing and requesting the Speaker to employ such counsel, as he may think proper to defend the suit brought by John Anderson against the said Thomas Dunn, and that the expenses be defrayed out of the contingent fund of the House; which resolution was concurred in.

Mr. N. reported also a bill concerning suits brought on copy rights; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Thomas Shields, for compensation for prisoners captured in the late war with Great Britain; which was read; when Mr. P. reported a bill concerning Thomas Shields and others; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House entitled "An act for the relief of William B. Lewis," with an amendment. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Rice Jones;" in which amendment and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill authorizing the corporation of the City of Washington to open and extend certain streets in certain parts of the City of Washington, through public reservations; which was twice read.

Mr. H., from the same committee, reported a bill authorizing the Rockville and Washington Turnpike Company to extend and make the same from the line of the District of Columbia to the boundary of the City of Washington; which bill was twice read, and was about to be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, when, on motion of Mr. RICH, it was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The verbal amendment of the Senate to the bill for the relief of William B. Lewis was taken up and agreed to.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John Rice Jones was twice read, and committed.

The bill reported at the last session, authorizing a subscription to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, being called, as the order of the day—

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, after stating that the gentleman (Mr. McLANE, of Delaware,) who reported this bill, and who was particularly interested in its discussion, was absent from the House, as one of the Bank Committee; and that the information directed by a resolution of the last session to be collected by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of internal improvements, had not yet been received respecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, moved that the Committee of the Whole, to whom the bill had been referred, be discharged therefrom, and that it be referred to the Committee on Internal Improvement; which motion prevailed, and the bill was accordingly so referred.

The bill for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker; the bill for the relief of Harold Smith; and the bill for the relief of Sampson S. King, severally passed through Committees of the Whole; and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. PINDALL, the select committee to whom was recommitted the bill to extend to John James Dufour, and others, the time of payment for certain lands, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and it was ordered to lie on the table. [The reason of this proceeding was, that a letter has been received, that the payment requested to be deferred has since actually been made, by a sacrifice of heavy discount.]

EBEN. STEVENS, AND OTHERS.

A motion was made by Mr. HENDRICKS, to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which the bill for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens, and others, was rejected, on the ground of a desire to recommit it for an amendment, the object of which was to submit the justice of the claim to the decision of the Supreme Court, or of some other judicial tribunal.

On the motion of Mr. STROTHER, protesting against the reconsideration, the yeas and nays were required on the question.

Whereupon, there arose a debate of considerable interest, and of two hours and more in length, on the question of reconsidering the matter. The motion was supported by Messrs. The bill to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, and the bill to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks for the District of Columbia, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and were, (the former with some amendments,) ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Burr also passed through a Committee of the Whole.

The same Committee took up, also, the bill for the relief of John Delafield, (to allow him to fund forty-three loan office certificates, of four hundred dollars each, with the balance of interest.)

The documents were read, connected with the bill last mentioned, and Mr. RUGGLES spoke some time in favor of the claim; after which the Committee rose, reported progress on the latter bill, and the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE, &c.

A Message, in writing, was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:
To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 24th instant, requesting me to lay before it "copies of the correspondence, if any, between the Department of War and the Governor of Georgia, in answer to the letter of the latter to the former, dated on the 1st of June, of the present year, communicated to the House on the 12th instant, and also the correspondence, if any, between the Department of War and General Andrew Jackson, in answer to the letter of the latter, of the date 7th May, 1818, also communicated to the House, on the 12th instant," I transmit a report from the Secretary of War, with a copy of an extract of a letter from Major Van Deventer, Chief Clerk in the Department of War, in reply to General Jackson's letter of the 7th of May, 1818.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 30, 1818.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th instant, "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House, if, in his opinion the same should not be inconsistent with the public interest, copies of the correspondence, if any, between the Department of War and the Governor of Georgia, in answer to the letter of the latter to the former, dated on the 1st of June of the present year, communicated to this House on the 12th instant; and also the correspondence, if any, between the Department of War and General Andrew Jackson, in answer to the letter of the latter, of the date of the 7th of May, 1818, also communicated to this House on the 12th instant," has the honor to transmit an extract of a letter written by Major Vandeventer, Chief Clerk, Department of War, in reply to General Jackson's letter of the 7th of May, 1818, and to state that no letter was written by this Department to the Governor of Georgia, in answer to his letter of the 1st of June, 1818.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Extract of a letter from Major C. Vandeventer, Chief Clerk, to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

"DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 2, 1818.

"Your letters of the 7th of April, one without date, and of the 26th of April, are received.

"The President of the United States and the Secretary of War are out of town. The former will return about the 15th instant, the latter not before the middle of next month. So soon as the President returns, your despatches, together with your orders to Major Davis, commanding the arrest of Captain Wright, and a copy of your letter to the Governor of Georgia, in relation to the horrid and atrocious destruction of the Choctaw village, will be laid before him. In the meantime I am advised to communicate the "opinion" that the trial of Captain Wright, by court martial, is decidedly preferable to a civil prosecution in the Federal court."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

IMPORTS FROM CANADA.

Mr. PALMER, of New York, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what provisions are necessary to be made more effectually to enforce the payment of duties on goods, &c. imported by land, from the British provinces in America, into the United States: also, that the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the 4th section of a law of Congress, passed the 3d day of March, 1817, that the provisions therein contained shall apply only to steamboats on Lake Champlain that are employed wholly in the transportation of passengers and their baggage, and that the said section shall not extend to authorize the entry of any goods, &c., except passengers' baggage, in any district other than the one into which they are to be landed; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. P. said that he had, a few days previously, moved the reference of similar resolutions to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures; that they were not then adopted, because, as he understood, the subject was thought most properly to refer itself to the Committee of Ways and Means. He now hastened, he said, to renew them with this alteration, lest it should be thought the House was unwilling to consider a subject that was of much importance to the section of country which he represented; which, he was persuaded, was not the case.

Mr. P. said, it had been his fortune, as residing nearer the frontier alluded to than most other members, to have witnessed the deplorable inadequacy of our revenue laws, as they are at present constituted, to meet the kind of importations by land from Canada which prevails on our Northern frontier; that the collectors of the district of Vermont and Champlain had both stated to him, in personal conversation, their full conviction that some improvements to the revenue laws applicable to our Northern frontier are absolutely necessary. It would be further recollected, Mr. P. said, that the Secretary of the Treasury, who is charged with the execution of our revenue laws, had, at the last session, recommended similar provisions to those now contemplated; but that those provisions had not yet been passed into law.

Mr. P. said, if it was necessary now to state in what the difficulties existing in the system of our revenue laws, as applicable to this frontier, consisted, he would say—that the revenue laws all contemplated goods, &c., to be entered at the office of the collector of the customs only, and not at the offices of the deputy collectors residing on the different roads, distant from the collector's office, by which goods are introduced. We had, Mr. P. said, provided for the appointment of deputy collectors, to be stationed on the principal roads by which goods are introduced, in order to guard them; but there were no provisions, Mr. P. said, obliging importers to report or enter their goods at those custom-house offices. Mr. P. said his object was to make it obligatory on the importers, under penalty of a forfeiture of their goods, and the other usual penalties, "to report and enter their goods at the office of the deputy collector nearest the road by which they are first imported." At present, goods were smuggled past the custom-house officers stationed on these several avenues; and, if pursued and overtaken, no penalty or forfeiture accrued; and it was sufficient for the smuggler to allege that he intended to enter his goods at the office of the collector of the district, where alone he is required, by law, to report and enter them; and the inspector must accept this declaration as sufficient, and receive the duties; hence a maxim has grown into use, "to import goods as secretly as possible, and, if detected, it is always soon enough to enter them and pay duties." One difficulty, out of many thus occasioned, was, that the officers of the customs, instead of receiving the duties and entries at the place where they are first imported, are compelled to pursue the goods, thus secretly introduced, all over the interior of these districts, in order to collect the duties on them; whereas, if the importers were required, by proper penalties and forfeitures, to enter them "at the office of the collector of the customs nearest the road by which they are first imported," the principal difficulties complained of would be removed. Mr. P. said that the other branch of the resolution applied to steamboats on Lake Champlain; and their object is to take, from such as may be used for the ordinary purposes of trade, the privilege of importing goods subject to duty, without observing the same rules which are exacted in other cases, in order to prevent imposition upon the revenue.

Mr. P. said he believed the privileges granted to steamboats to enter goods, other than passengers' baggage, in any other district than the one in which they were to be landed, had already proved injurious to its operations. But, Mr. P. said, he had a further and more powerful reason which induced him to wish for an alteration of the law, alluded to in this branch of the resolution. Mr. P. said it was now understood, that an additional steamboat would be employed on that lake the next season, which was intended to be solely employed for the purposes of commerce. And if this section is permitted to remain, a provision, which was only intended to afford a facility to the transportation of passengers and their baggage, will become applicable to the great body of our importations by that lake, and will supersede one of the principal guards to our revenue laws; that is, the necessity of entering goods, which are subject to duties, in the district in which they are landed. Mr. P. said that he should not have troubled the House with the observations he had made, but that the subject was somewhat local, and he had thought it due to the House to express some of the principal reasons which had induced him to offer the resolution to the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. MERCER introduced the resolution which follows by a few remarks, importing that the law of the United States prohibiting the citizens of the United States from engaging in the slave trade, was evaded in a manner which demanded the interposition of Congress. He referred to the law which authorizes the President of the United States to employ our armed vessels in executing its provisions, and also authorizes those vessels to seize and bring into the ports of the United States all ships and vessels engaged in the violation of it. In a publication which Mr. M. said he had seen, and to which he referred, the names were given of at least twenty vessels fitted out in the ports of the United States for the obvious purpose of carrying on the slave trade. Appeals had been taken from the decisions which had been made by the inferior tribunals in some of these cases, and the names of American houses and American citizens engaged in this detestable traffic, were to be found on the records of the British court. To obtain information having a direct bearing on this subject, Mr. M. submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House a copy of such instructions, if any, as may have been issued by this Department, in pursuance of the act of Congress of 1817, prohibiting the importation of slaves, to the commanders of the armed vessels of the United States, for the purpose of intercepting, on the coast of Africa, or elsewhere, such vessels as have been engaged in the slave trade.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER then said, he had another resolution to offer, in relation to another branch of the same subject. We have all been informed, he said, in the course of the last few months, that individuals brought into the United States, in violation of the law before referred to, had, in execution of the provisions of the law, been condemned to hereditary slavery; and, on examining the acts of Congress, he found that the authority under which this iniquity (he would so call it) had been practised, was derived from one of those acts. To obtain such information as might assist the House in arriving at a proper remedy for this fault, he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the number and names of the slave ships, if any, which have been seized and condemned within the United States for violation of the laws thereof against the importation of slaves, and if any negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, have been found on board such vessels, their number, and the disposition which have been made of them by the several State governments under whose jurisdiction they have fallen.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

JANUARY, 1819.

Mr. STROTHER moved to amend the resolution to as to direct a report to be made also of the number and names of the slave ships, if any, and the ports from which they had sailed, if they could be ascertained. Mr. S. said he wished that the ignominy of this trade, if any, should attach where it belonged, and not be imputed, on the authority of general rumor, to the whole country. He wished at least that the country of which he was a Representative should be absolved from any charge of participation in it.

Mr. FLOYD wished, also, that the names of the places where the vessels are owned should be added to that of the place whence they sailed.

Mr. COBB desired to amend this resolve further, so as to require information by whom, as well as where, the vessels were owned.

These amendments were not objected to by Mr. MERCER, and were, as well as the original motion, all agreed to.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of John Delafield.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, occupied the floor, in opposition to the claim, until after three o'clock; when the Committee rose and reported progress.

TUESDAY, January 5.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him by Benjamin H. Latrobe, late Surveyor of the Public Buildings and of the Capitol, at the City of Washington, in relation to his conduct while in the capacity aforesaid; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of John Gooding and James Williams; which was read; when Mr. S. reported a bill for the relief of the said John Gooding and James Williams; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were directed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the amount of the security to be required from navy agents, made a report; which was read; when Mr. P. reported a bill concerning navy agents; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PINDALL, from the select committee appointed at the last session, on the subject, reported a bill to authorize the prosecution of suits, in the nature of petitions of right and informalities of intrusion, in cases in which the United States are concerned; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COBB, from the select committee to which was committed, yesterday, the bill explanatory of the act, authorizing the sale of certain grounds, belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington, reported the same with an amendment; which was read, and the said bill was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law to vest, in the Legislature of the State of Ohio, power to sell the remaining thirty-five sections of land in the reservation at the Sciota Salt Works, and to apply the proceeds of the sale to such purposes, for the use of the State, as the said Legislature may deem most proper.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the Committee on the subject of the Militia were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alteration or amendment to the laws of the United States are necessary to insure an equitable enrolment, and annual returns of the militia of the respective States.

On motion by Mr. SAMPSON, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the fifth section of the act, entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt; granting a bounty on pickled fish exported; and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries," so that the owner of every vessel above twenty tons, employed in the fisheries, shall receive an allowance of four dollars, for each and every ton of such vessel's burden: Provided, That the allowance aforesaid on any one vessel, for one season, shall not exceed three hundred and sixty dollars.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of fixing the standard of weights and measures.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the First Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting a list, made out by the Register of the Treasury, of those persons who have not rendered accounts for settlement within the year; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The Committee of the Whole having been discharged, on motion of Mr. RICH, from the further consideration of the bill to authorize the Rockville and Washington Turnpike Company to make the road as far as the city boundary, the same was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:
I transmit to Congress a proclamation, dated the 22d of last month, of the convention made and concluded at Madrid, between the Plenipotentiaries of the United States and His Catholic Majesty, on the 11th of August, 1802, the ratifications of which were not exchanged till the 21st ultimo, together with the translation of a letter from the Minister of Spain, to the Secretary of State.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 4, 1819.

The Message was read, and, with its accompanying documents, ordered to lie on the table.

Military Appropriation Bill.

H. OF R.

BILLS REJECTED.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of John Delafield.

Mr. RHEA concluded, in about half an hour, the speech he yesterday commenced against the bill. He was followed by Mr. BALDWIN and Mr. CUSHMAN, each at some length, in support of the bill.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved to strike out the first section of the bill, which motion was carried by a large majority; and,

On motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, the first section of the bill for the relief of Samuel Burr, referred to the same Committee of the Whole, was also stricken out.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bills as amended to the House.

The question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on striking out the first section of the bill for the relief of John Delafield, was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—90 to 64, and the bill of course rejected.

The amendment reported to the bill for the relief of Samuel Burr, was also concurred in by the House, and the bill of course rejected.

Then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 6.

Mr. CROWELL, from the select committee appointed on the petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Alabama, on behalf of Tandy Walker, reported a bill to place the said Tandy Walker on the pension list; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. CROWELL, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the sale of such townships of land, in the Alabama Territory, that have been returned by the surveyors, as not, in their opinion, worth two dollars per acre, and consequently not surveyed or offered for sale.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President and Managers of the Rockville and Washington Turnpike Road Company, in the State of Maryland, to extend and make a turnpike road to or from the boundary of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, through the said District, to the line thereof," was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, the Secretary of War was directed to report to this House, the present strength and distribution of the Army of the United States; and to subjoin to such report the number and value of the extra days' labor performed by the several detachments thereof, respectively, in the year ending on the 30th day of October last, upon roads or other objects of fatigue duty; together with a statement of such objects, if any there are, of a similar nature, to which it is contemplated to direct the labor of the troops, in the current year, distinguishing the sums expended on roads.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The orders of the day being then announced, a motion was made by Mr. SMITH of Maryland, to take up, out of its turn, the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for 1819. This departure from the usual course of business requires the unanimous consent of the House. Mr. MERCER of Virginia, objected, and the question was therefore not put.

Mr. SMITH then moved to postpone all the orders of the day which preceded that bill, in order to take it up.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, opposed the motion, considering it, in the present state of the business before the House, to be premature. There were several propositions before the House, yet to be decided on, by which the provisions of the bill might be affected; amongst which was a proposition to reduce the Army, the decision of which ought certainly to precede that on this bill.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, also opposed the motion. There was no part of our institutions, he said, in regard to which there ought to be less precipitation, or more deliberation, than in what regarded the Army of the United States. That, he said, was the doctrine of the Constitution. The illustrious framers of that instrument were men who looked back on the pages of history, and forward into futurity; and amongst other provisions of the Constitution, they had inserted one which provides that no appropriation to the use of the Army shall be for a longer term than two years. Mr. M. was opposed to going into the consideration of the bill at the present time, for reasons which he proceeded to state. He had waited, he said, and the nation had anxiously waited until the two committees appointed to inquire into the subject of the Seminole war should make their reports. The House was aware that some difference of opinion had existed between those two committees, as to the scope of their respective duties; but, he had this morning understood with pleasure, from the chairman of the Military Committee, that a report on this important subject might be expected from that committee in a few days. Now, Mr. M. said, he would exercise the candor here to declare, that his own opinion on the subject was made up; but the courtesy due to those differently situated and to the usual course of debate in the House forbade him from proceeding, at this time, to intimate the grounds of his opinion; which was, that, if there was no other mode of expressing the sense of this House, in relation to the transactions of that war, the number of Major Generals in the Army should be reduced to one. If no other gentleman should make a motion to that effect, Mr. M. said he should, very reluctantly, take upon himself the burden of proposing an expression of the opinion of the House in some shape or other. He should at present invite no discussion on this subject, unless other gentlemen sought it; but, he said—for he had not for many nights been able to sleep in quiet on his pillow from his painful reflections on the transactions of that war—it was a duty he owed to himself, to his constituents, and to his country, and which he should therefore feel himself bound to perform, to express his sentiments on the subject of the incidents and character of the Seminole war.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland said, that, for his part, his plumbers had not been at all disturbed by the circumstance the gentleman had referred to; nor did he see what connexion the question arising out of the Seminole war had with the annual appropriation bill for the support of the Army. His object was to pass the bill, that the officers of the Government might not be obliged to make use of the public money without appropriations by law, or the Army to remain unpaid. Was it not proper, he asked, that appropriations should be made before the commencement of the year? Or was the House to wait till the end of the session, and till all the discussions on the subject of the Seminole war had been gone through? Suppose the proposition to reduce the Army should succeed, the appropriation bill would not interfere with it, because, if the expenditure should be diminished, the surplus would remain in the Treasury. In the early history of our Government, it had been usual to pass the annual appropriation bills soon in the session; and such, Mr. S. thought, was the obviously proper course. The Quartermaster General's department and provision department must go on; and the appropriations for them ought not to be withheld longer than was absolutely necessary.

Mr. MERCER said, the argument of the gentleman, that the appropriation bill ought to pass before the commencement of the year, proved too much; for this was not the first day of the month, but the sixth, nor the first of the session, said he, for we have been here almost two months. The framers of the Constitution, he said, looked to this mode of checking abuses in the military authority; and, countenanced by their authority and by their wisdom, he should persevere in his opposition to going into Committee of the Whole at this time on the appropriation bill.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said, if the gentleman supposed that, by going into Committee of the Whole now, the appropriation bill would be immediately despatched, he was very much mistaken. The first inquiry, on proceeding to the consideration of the bill, would be, whether the House approved of the purposes in which the Army had been employed. This would bring before the House not only the conduct of any particular part of the Army, but the whole Military Establishment. Mr. S. was, therefore, opposed to going into Committee of the Whole, until he saw the report of the Committee of Military Affairs on the subject, as it was understood that the whole subject would thus soon be properly before them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, if there was not reason to expect that discussion would take place on direct propositions, respecting the Seminole war and the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambriester, as well as for the reduction of the Army.

he should not have been surprised at this incidental discussion. This morning, he said, had been the first time the Military Committee had been able to take up the subject referred to them, and no disposition to procrastinate could be attributed to them, when it was known that in the next week the Military Committee would make some kind of a report. So far from any abuse in the administration of the War Department, calling for legislation out of the ordinary course, without going into particulars—he would no more than the gentleman from Virginia provoke a discussion at this time—the same establishment called for a less appropriation this year, by $500,000, than last year, in consequence of the changes made in the arrangements of the War Department by late modifications of its details. As a general principle, unless in times of great public calamity, the courtesy never had been denied to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to take up the appropriation bills when called for by him. It was proper that this bill should now be early passed upon, to prevent, on the one hand, that kind of interregnum in the establishment which must be produced by stopping the expenditure for provisions, pay, &c., or, on the other, the alternative of paying money from the Treasury without previous appropriation by law. He hoped, therefore, the bill would be permitted to go on.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, he was very well satisfied, that, with respect to the greater part of the military appropriations, it was practicable for the House to act on them, and to go on and make appropriations, without committing themselves on any principle likely to be brought into discussion. But there was at least one subject embraced in the bill, to which this remark did not apply; and it was proper to inquire whether, on that subject, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means could impart to the House the information necessary to enable it to act understandingly. Mr. T. said, he had seen, in the National Intelligencer of this morning, notice that thirteen miles of the military road on the northern frontier of New York had been completed. He did not allude to this work because he disapproved of it, for it had his hearty approbation—but, he asked, by what authority had this road been made, and by what means? By the authority, undoubtedly, of an appropriation made by Congress, in the last appropriation bill. By what authority would that work, now in progress, continue to be prosecuted? That these thirteen miles of excellent northern road were made for nothing, when the House very well knew that the Cumberland road cost at least something, was not to be believed. By what authority, then, was the road to be continued? By the authority, unquestionably, of an appropriation contained in this bill. Agreed, sir, said Mr. T.—give me internal improvement, under the authority of Congress, and I care little what department has charge of it. But I think it but fair, and perfectly right, that this House should distinctly express its opinion on the subject.

When we come to that part of the appropriation for the Quartermaster's department, or for the Pay department, I think it would be better to separate from them so much as is required by the expenditure for making roads, and that it be either appropriated in a separate bill, or under a separate head of expenditure in the same bill, that we may all see and understand what it is we vote. Before he sat down, Mr. T. said, that, hoping to get the necessary information from the gentleman, he should not be averse to taking up the appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, after stating that the House was in possession of most of the information the Committee of Ways and Means had received, said that the committee had no information going directly to the object of the gentleman last up; there was an estimate for the cost of lime, timber, &c., including extra pay to the soldiers for work, but the smallness of the sum, only $30,000, induced him to believe that this appropriation applied only to work to be done on barracks, &c. But, if the gentleman desired to make a separate article of the amount of extra pay to soldiers for work on roads, there would be no difficulty in doing it. Mr. S. took occasion to signify his approbation of this mode of employing the troops.

Mr. TUCKER said he could scarcely have supposed that so much road had been made, and that no information on the subject had been communicated to the Committee of Ways and Means. He should therefore move a resolution calling for information on this subject; for he did think, when they were obliged to leave the lead in getting through this House appropriations for the unfinished road in the West, making under the authority of the United States, under the obligation of a compact with one of the States; when on this subject every inch of ground had to be fought for, it was proper that the House should have some information respecting the roads making under the direction of the Executive. Mr. T. said he was happy to perceive that the Secretary of War, who had been one of the most able advocates of the system of internal improvement in this House, had not, in his transit to another office, dropt his principles by the way, but continued the friend and the agent of internal improvement in his present station. Mr. T. said he was glad to see the work in question going on; for he had, on coming into this House, parted with local partialities and prejudices, and was desirous to see anything in progress which was to benefit any part of the country. If the bill should be taken up, he said he should move to amend it, so to separate the expense of making roads from the other items in the bill, as that it should be rendered impossible for any man to read without understanding it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said, in addition to the subject of the road, the ground on which he particularly opposed going into Committee was, that there is a proposition on the table to reduce the Military Peace Establishment, and that, until that proposition was finally acted on, he did not feel himself at liberty to vote a single cent for the support of the establishment.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, was in favor of taking up the bill. As to the extra pay to soldiers, for work done on roads, fatigue duty done by them had always been paid for, from the earliest date of the Government to the present day, and the appropriation for it now involved no new principle. As to the question of the Seminole war, that, he said, ought to stand by itself, and not to interfere with the current and ordinary business of the session.

Mr. REED, of Maryland, said that the discussion had already proceeded far enough to show the propriety of the observations of the gentleman from North Carolina. It proved that larger appropriations had been made than were necessary for the payment of the Army, and that a part of the money appropriated under the head of military expenditure, had been applied to the purpose of making roads. It appeared clearly to him, that the question on the proposition to reduce the Army ought to be first settled.

The question was then taken on going into Committee of the Whole on the Military Appropriation bill, and decided in the affirmative by a small majority.

The bill in question embraces the following items of appropriation:

- For subsistence (in addition to $200,000 already appropriated,) $506,600.
- For forage for officers, $26,496.
- For clothing, $400,000.
- For bounties and premiums, $62,500.
- For the medical and hospital department, $50,000.
- For the quartermaster's department, $550,000.
- For contingencies of the Army, $60,000.
- For arrearages, arising from a deficiency in the appropriation to pay outstanding claims, $100,000.
- For fortifications, $500,000.
- For making a survey of the water-courses tributary to, and west of, the Mississippi; also, those tributary to the same river, and northwest of the Ohio, $6,500.
- For the current expenses of the ordnance department, $100,000.
- For the armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry, $375,000.
- For arming and equipping the militia, $200,000.
- For the erection and completion of arsenals, to wit: for completing the arsenal at Augusta, in Georgia, $50,000; for erecting a powder magazine at Frankford, near Philadelphia, $15,000; for completing the arsenal and other works at Watertown, near Boston, $20,000; for completing the arsenal and other works at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, $5,000; for a levee round the arsenal at Watervleit, New York, $6,000; for building a powder magazine at Baton Rouge, $20,000.
- For cannon, powder, and shot, to fulfil existing contracts; for mounting cannon, and for purchase of lead, $191,200.
- To provide for the payment of the retained bounty, and the per diem travelling allowance of pay and subsistence to soldiers discharged from the Army in the year 1819, $92,500.
- For the purchase of maps, plans, books, and instruments for the War Department, $1,500.
- For fuel, maps, plans, books, erection of quarters and other buildings, and for contingent expenses for the Academy at West Point, $35,640.

For marking and running the boundary line of the several cessions of land made by the Indians, $15,000.

For the payment of half-pay pensions to widows and orphans, $200,000.

For the annual allowance to invalid pensioners of the United States, $368,039.

For the annual allowance to the Revolutionary pensioners, under the law of March 18, 1818, $1,708,500.

For arrearages arising from a deficiency in the appropriation for paying the Revolutionary pensions in the year 1818, $139,400 85.

For the Indian department, including arrearages incurred by holding Indian treaties, $213,000.

For annuity to the Creek nation, under the treaty of 1802, $3,000.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1819; to which Committee had also been referred a bill for modifying, in some respects, the Staff department of the Army.

Mr. COLERON, of Virginia, said he hoped that gentlemen would take up the appropriation bill first; and that they would not at this time urge upon the Committee the consideration of a bill of so much importance as the other bill referred to that Committee, which so short a time had been allowed to examine.

The appropriation bill was taken up; and, having been read through—

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said that, although he approved entirely of the course the House had pursued of taking up the public business of the session, in preference to the tedious sittings they had lately held for the adjudication of private claims, he must confess he was somewhat surprised at the scantiness of the information which he had heard, whilst in the chair, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was able to afford to the House on the subjects embraced in the bill. He had given notice, he said, yesterday to the gentleman, that he should make the inquiry of him, when this bill came up, as to the amount of money Congress had parted with, and the amount it was now called upon to appropriate for the purpose of making roads. It was with surprise, Mr. C. said, he had heard from the gentleman, after this notice, that he had no information on the subject. He hoped, he said, the gentleman would refresh his memory, and find under what item of the bill the appropriation was made for extra pay to the Army for the purpose of constructing military roads. It was very important that the House should have this information. It would be recollected that at the last session this great Constitutional question of the power of Congress to make internal improvements had been discussed in this House. It would be recollected that whilst the power of the Executive branch of the Government to employ the labor and money of the nation on objects of internal improvement had been strenuously maintained, the same power was as strenuously denied to Congress. Mr. C. said he had understood that, in addition to the Northern road to which the gentleman had alluded, other roads, bearing the denomination of military roads, were making—for example, a great and magnificent road from the Tennessee river to Lake Ponchartrain; and that over this military road it was proposed very soon to march a detachment of stage coaches, proposals having been already made to the Post Office Department to avail itself of the services of this description of military corps. If it be the pleasure of this House, said Mr. C., to fold its arms, and see, one by one, every power of Government taken from it—the power to lay taxes, to make war, to apply the sword and purse of the nation—be it so. But for his part, Mr. C. said, he desired information; as that which the House now had was extremely unsatisfactory. He begged the attention of gentlemen to it. Mr. C. then read the few first lines of the letter of the Secretary of War to the Committee of Ways and Means, until he came to that part of the letter, speaking of the documents being so voluminous as to make it necessary, to save the time required for copying them, to send the originals. Documents so voluminous, Mr. C. said, that notwithstanding the number—How many clerks were there in the War Department? he really could not count them—they could not be copied. These documents, so voluminous that they could not be copied, because there were so few clerks in the War Department, considering that they related to the expenditure of some millions of dollars, afforded yet very scanty information. Sir, said Mr. C., upon my unfortunate friends, the Patriots of South America, we can have whole volumes, nay, whole libraries, copied and printed; but on this very important affair, of appropriating six or seven millions of dollars, some few fragments of paper are thrown into the House, and then we are told the affairs of the country cannot go on, the wheels of the Government must stop, unless we forthwith pass the bill. Mr. C. said he hoped the honorable chairman would look again at his notes, and see in what part of the bill the appropriation for this fatigue money, as the expense of making the road is called, is contained. Mr. C. said he did not so much want the information for himself, as for the benefit of his honorable friend who now sat in the chair, (Mr. H. NELSON,) who at the last session so pathetically deplored that Congress should attempt to appropriate money for making roads; or for his eloquent colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who had advocated the same side of the question. He hoped one of those gentlemen would move to strike out that part of the bill when it was discovered where it was, that the Committee might see what it was doing, and that a clear expression might be obtained of the opinion of the House, whether the Executive was to go on, at its own will and pleasure, to make roads, without Congress having any other concern in the matter than to pass the appropriation bill, whenever the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means chose to call it up.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, rose for the purpose, he said, of thanking the Speaker for the very polite and friendly manner in which he had expressed an inclination to furnish him (Mr. B.) with information whereon to bottom his vote. That information, Mr. B. said, he did not want; for he did not mean, as long as he was a member of this House, to submit either to Legislative or Executive assumption of power. When the subject was before the House at the last session, he had freely expressed the opinion he had ever entertained, that neither this, nor any department of the Government had the power to make roads in the several States. The gentleman's kindness, therefore, ought to have been directed to some other quarter of the House. Mr. B. repeated, and he wished it to be distinctly understood, that, as on the one hand he believed no two departments together possessed the power to make roads, so neither did any one of them. He did not mean, knowingly, to vote for any item of appropriation intended to cover that object. But, at the same time, he said, he did not feel that he was now in want of any information on the subject; for he found the first item now particularly under consideration, in language respecting the import of which he could not possibly doubt, and which he could not hesitate to vote for. It was this: "For the pay of the Army, one million of dollars." What was the "pay of the Army?" An act of Congress has fixed the number of the Army of the United States, including officers of every grade. The same authority has attached to every private certain proportions of pay; so much per month to the major generals, and down through the whole graduated scale to the private. When, then, he was called upon to give his vote on this item, what was he to understand? He was about to vote for that only which the constituted authorities had declared should be paid; if he was to vote for more, he should then be indebted to the honorable Speaker for any information going to establish that point. If language be not one thing, and intention another, he should feel himself, on every principle of propriety, warranted in giving his vote in favor of an item, which, until otherwise informed, he should take to mean what it purported. We are already advanced into the year 1819, and the appropriation for the last year being presumed to be expended, it was proper that this bill should pass without unnecessary delay, as no money can constitutionally be drawn from the Treasury without appropriation by law.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he was very glad that anything had served to relieve the House from the state of apathy into which it had fallen for some weeks past. So desirous were gentlemen now to take the floor, that they had gone beyond the usual course of proceedings, which had been, to allow to the chairman of the committee who reported a bill, at least the privilege of having the first word. He should not, however, permit himself to be drawn off from the subject of the bill into an argument, on a subject which had been sufficiently discussed in this House at the last session, and which was, besides, rather irrelevant to the question before the House. Mr. S. then went into a detailed statement, founded on information which the Committee of Ways and Means had sought and obtained from the War Department, of the component parts of the several items of appropriation, and of the reason why the appropriations recommended by the committee were less than the first estimates furnished to the House proposed—this reduction of the amount being justified by the surplus of appropriation under the item of pay remaining unexpended, and by the diminution of expenditure under the item of subsistence, occasioned by the change from the contract to the Commissariat system of supply. Mr. S. thus went on, and separately explained the occasion for the several appropriations. In the course of his remarks he stated that, among the contracts made by the Ordnance department, was one for cannon suitable for the militia service, which he was very glad to hear of, considering it as of much importance.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, rose to notice what had fallen from the honorable Speaker. The appropriation for extra pay to the soldiers for working on military roads, &c., was certainly contained in the bill, or the expenditure made under the order of the Executive was not merely under color of an appropriation by law, but was absolutely without any appropriation. The amount expended for extra pay for fatigue duty, might, no doubt, readily be ascertained by a motion for that purpose; but it was not in the power of the committee to afford it. There was, in the annual military appropriation bill, an item of contingent expenses of considerable amount, but the precise application of which could not, from its very nature, be anticipated. It is an item in all appropriation bills, the expenditure of which must be trusted to the discretion of the Heads of Departments and of the President. If he understood that item correctly, out of it the President or the Secretary of War might pay the soldiers for extra duty, working on the roads, or other necessary military works. How could the Speaker attain his object but by lessening the appropriation? And how was it to be ascertained how much, for this purpose, the appropriation for contingencies ought to be curtailed? Mr. T. said, for himself, he thought the application of money to the making of roads to be illegal, unless it was specifically appropriated. He hoped some mode would be found of checking it by law, or of conveying to the Executive an intimation, that no part of the sums appropriated under other heads of expenditure should be applied to the purpose of making roads. But, at present, unless the whole item of contingent expenses were struck out, which would hardly be advisable, he did not see how the gentleman, his colleague, could come at his object.

Mr. CLAY said, he really must profess it was with surprise, as well as regret, he found that the House could have, from the Committee of Ways and Means, no sufficient information on the subject on which he had asked for it. I have re-questioned the gentleman to tell me, said Mr. C., which of the items in this bill comprehends the appropriation for the expense of making roads, under the authority of the Executive; instead of answering my inquiry, the gentleman from Maryland has gone into a general exposé of the bill. Is it possible, that an appropriation bill is brought into this House, accompanied by all the estimates and statements from the proper department, containing, among others, an important appropriation; because involving a great Constitutional question, on which the Legislature and the Executive are divided in opinion, and yet the chairman of the committee cannot tell us in which of the several items of the bill this appropriation is contained? It was true that another honorable gentleman, his colleague, has given the House information on the subject, but, said Mr. C., in a way not bearing the stamp of certainty. He says the appropriation is certainly in the bill. Yes, sir, we have found the covert in which the game lies; and I wish we could start it. My colleague thinks it is quite likely it is in the item of contingencies. I wish we could be sure of it. Mr. C. said, he had yesterday given the honorable chairman (Mr. SMITH) notice that he should call on him this day for information on this subject, and he was surprised not to receive it. He should like to know from the honorable chairman, he said, whether the public interest was likely to suffer by one or two days' delay of this bill; it was due to Congress, to the interests which the members of this House represented, not to proceed hastily on it. Unless some reason why the bill should immediately pass could be shown, he should hope the Committee would rise; and if there were not already clerks enough in the War Department to copy the papers required for the information of Congress, he was willing to vote for more. He submitted, he said, to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) since he conceded the point that he would not vote for money to be applied to what in his (Mr. B.'s) judgment was an unconstitutional purpose, whether the same consideration ought not to restrain that honorable gentleman from voting to pay for men who are thus to be unconstitutionally employed. If you would not give the money of the nation for a particular purpose, would you give the labor of the nation? For, Mr. C. said, he took it, that the army of the nation, from which the labor on roads was derived, afforded as much the labor of the nation, as the amount paid the soldiers for extra duty in the same vocation was the money of the nation. He was aware it might be said the responsibility for misapplication of money appropriated by Congress belonged to the respective departments, &c. But what, he asked, was the reason of the Constitutional limits to appropriations of money; and what particularly of that clause which provides that no appropriation for the pay of the Army shall be for more than two years? Certainly, that this House might hold a control over this sometimes unmanageable machine, a standing army; that it might control it by withholding, in extreme cases, the appropriations necessary to keep it in existence. Was it not known that, year after year, whilst the Executive too sends a message to Congress expressing the opinion that they had no power to make roads or canals, the Executive employs the Army in the very object over which he denied the power to Congress? Was this not one of the cases contemplated by the Constitution? At least, for those who held the doctrine of a defect of power in the General Government to employ the resources of the nation on objects of internal improvement, here was a case in which they ought to say, we will no longer continue to appropriate money to be thus misapplied. In answer to the difficulty started by his colleague, as to the mode of preventing this misapplication of public money, Mr. C. said it would be easy to effect that object, if it could be once ascertained under what head was included the appropriation in question. He had heard, he said, an anecdote of a former member of this House, which might furnish the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means with a clue to find the proper item. Some years ago it had been the custom, now abolished, to use in this House a beverage in lieu of water for those members who preferred it. A member of the House said he was not in the habit of using this sort of substitute for one of nature's greatest and purest bounties, but would prefer something stronger. The officers of the House said they should be glad to gratify him, but did not know how they could with propriety pay for it out of the contingent fund. Why, said the member, under what head of appropriation do you pay for this syrup for the use of the members? Under the head of stationery, the officer said. Well, replied the member, put down a little grog under the head of fuel, and let me have it. Mr. C. said that, seriously, he did not think the honorable chairman ought to have been so much at a loss. I have asked for bread, said he, and he has given me a stone; I have asked for information on a particular point, and he has given us information on every point but that. Is there or is there not in the bill an appropriation for the expense of making roads by the War Department? One member said he thought it was under one head, but was not certain. If not there, where was it? He hoped the House would delay acting on the bill until they could obtain this information.

Mr. BARBOUR again rose, observing that he had never more unexpectedly than now found himself brought into a discussion by what he would call the argumentum ad hominem of the honorable Speaker, which he felt himself bound again to notice. The gentleman had said, if you are indisposed to vote the money, will you not withhold the labor of the people of the United States from a particular object? If the question propounded to me, said Mr. B., were whether I would refuse to put the labor of the nation at the disposition of the Government for an unconstitutional purpose, I answer in the affirmative—unquestionably I would. But what is the proposition actually before the House? Shall we keep and maintain an army? I am, said he, in favor of a standing army to a certain extent; and I take this occasion to state that, as I am at present informed, I do not consider the present army as too large—leaving myself, however, on this head, open to conviction. Whilst thus in favor of it, shall I vote for its disbandment because, peradventure, in the progress of time its labor may be applied to a purpose which I do not wish? Mr. B. said he was, indeed, disposed to withhold any appropriation, specific or contingent, which should authorize the Executive to employ the soldiery in the construction of roads. But, whilst he would do this, he would not withhold the pay of the army, as fixed by law, the maintenance of which army he considered consistent with the well-being of the country, because, by possibility, the labor of that army might be applied to a purpose he should not consider correct.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, was of opinion that the House ought not to proceed to act upon this subject without further information. There were in this House various classes of opinion on the subject of the power of the Government to execute internal improvements. Of one class, opposed to the construction of roads in any manner by any branch of the Government, was his friend from Virginia, who had just sat down. It appeared to Mr. T. that information on the subject must be necessary for him; for he was a member of this House when the two last annual appropriation bills passed, under the authority of appropriations, in some part or other of which three or four roads had been making; and those bills received the gentleman's vote. Since the gentleman thought all appropriations for such objects unconstitutional, did he not desire some information on this head? There was another class in the House anxious to see improvements going on in any shape. Was it not desirable to them to have information on the subject? Mr. T. wished to proceed on tangible ground; if they were to fight for one road in this House, he wished all roads to pass the same ordeal. The Speaker appeared to think that the Secretary of War ought to have furnished the House with information on this subject. Mr. T. said he knew not, and perhaps he doubted because of his very favorable opinion of the gentleman who filled that office, whether he ought to have volunteered this information. The Secretary had before him the fact, that no such information had heretofore been thought necessary to be communicated, respecting roads known to have been constructed under the orders of that Department. If the information had been asked from the War Department, Mr. T. said he had no doubt it would have been afforded with the utmost promptitude. It is our business to call for information on the subject, said he; and my object in rising was to express the hope that the Committee will rise, and I will submit a motion having that object in view. [Mr. T. here read a motion to that effect, which he proposed to move should the Committee rise.]

Mr. MENCER, of Virginia, said, he had before attempted to catch the eye of the gentleman who was in the Chair, but had with pleasure given way to the honorable Speaker, whose object was to obtain information, which he was surprised the chairman had not in his power to furnish. The Committee, Mr. M. said, could not have forgotten that, at the last session, a certain part of the House having a desire to express, in some sort, a censure on the practice of allowing brevet pay, the Committee of Ways and Means had instructed their chairman to insert a provision in the general appropriation bill, and then to move to strike it out. Of such a specification, if inserted in the present bill, in regard to the appropriation for extra pay for the labor of the troops, on roads, Mr. M. said, he presumed the honorable gentleman from Kentucky would take the same view as himself, and would rather increase than diminish it. What difficulty could there be in making a discriminating and specific appropriation in this case, since, at the last session, it was so readily made, where the object was to deprive our gallant officers, who had shed their blood in their country's service, of the poor reward allowed them by the brevet pay attached to the rank their bravery had won, in the defence of the dearest rights and interests of the country? That discrimination was then made; and it appeared to him impossible but this mode of reaching the object now in view must have occurred to some member of the Committee of Ways and Means. It must now be apparent, Mr. M. thought, that the very respectable minority, whom he had counted in their seats, on the question of going into Committee of the Whole, were right in supposing gentlemen were not ready for the discussion. There was another subject, he said, of a painful nature, which ought to undergo the examination of the House before the bill passed. If he were to introduce the debate by a motion to amend this bill, he should find a precedent in the motion, at the last session, having for its object the acknowledgment of the independence of the South American colonies; and, with the object he had in view, had he regarded the course pursued at the last session as correct, he might resort to a motion to reduce the appropriation for the support of the army. The course, Mr. M. said, which he expected the House would be invited to pursue, by those who concurred with him in opinion with respect to the events of the Seminole war, was one in which he could not concur, and imposed on him the necessity of expressing his opinion in a different way. If the course which he proposed were not pursued, some other would be proposed, which, if receiving the assent of the House, would amount to a censure on the Chief Magistrate, or some other officer of the army. For this he was not prepared; he would not vote a censure on the Chief Magistrate, because he thought the occasion would not warrant it, and because, moreover, he doubted the Constitutional power of this House to pronounce censure on the President, in any other mode than that prescribed by the Constitution. Still less, in his opinion, had this House the Constitutional authority to pass a vote of censure on the commander of the army. The proper mode of trying a military officer was by a court martial, convened at the instance of an informer; and it was not the office of this House to become an informer, to bring any officer before a court martial. Mr. M. said, he therefore wished to come at his object by a course analogous to the practice of the country from which we have borrowed most of our institutions; a course pointed out, indeed, by the Constitution itself. He wished to institute an inquiry, whether the army was such a one as we ought to sustain; whether the establishment was such that, in some branch or other of it, it could not be properly reduced. For this purpose, he desired that this bill should be postponed; and, so far from a necessity for expedition for passing it, the contrary was demonstrated by the fact, stated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, of surpluses existing of the last year's appropriation. Why, then, hasten a decision on it? Are all our proceedings, said Mr. M., to be conducted in this way? Are we to listen from day to day—listen—nay, are we to look on with listless indifference, whilst, day after day, the Speaker and Clerk adjudicate private claims, and then, unexpectedly, to be precipitated into Committee of the Whole on important questions, which, but for a sort of legislative legerdemain, that of postponing the orders of the day, would not have presented themselves in the order of business for many days to come? This, he said, was the second time he had witnessed, in this House, this mode of arriving at a particular bill; and the first time he had seen it, at the last session, was also to bring up the army bill. If the military year so ended as to require the appropriation bill to pass before the first day of January, or the operations and pay of the army to be suspended, this was another difficulty that required attention, and the military year should be so arranged by law as not to begin on the first of January, but the fourth of March in each year, that the amount of appropriation might be duly adapted to the measures of the session affecting the army expenditure. The questions presented, and to be presented to the House, were worth deliberation. At this moment, when not a whisper of party spirit was heard; when all parties united in singing hosannas to the present Administration, should he not be allowed, though he should stand alone in the course he proposed to pursue, an opportunity of expressing his views? If gentlemen were prepared to pronounce their opinion; if they were willing to receive, as satisfactory to their minds, the State paper recently transmitted to the House, which had been pronounced to contain a complete justification of the proceedings in Florida—a State paper covered with flowers, but with flowers that scented of blood—he hoped he should be allowed the opportunity of showing the reasons why he did not subscribe to that opinion. He was not prepared, he desired it to be understood, to reduce the army—not a man of them. He had for many days had a resolution in his pocket, which he had not pressed on the House, because he thought the proper time for it had not arrived—the object of which was to show that the army could be so employed as to aid in the very object of internal improvement which had been this morning the subject of discussion. [The object of this resolution, Mr. M. stated: it was the same motion which he introduced, after the close of the debate this day, and which was agreed to.] He said we had not in the army a man too many; and the proposition he had announced his intention to make, to reduce the number of Major Generals, sprung exclusively from the view which he took of recent occurrences on the southern border.

Military Appropriation Bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, after showing that the army would not be disbanded, nor even deranged in any manner by a few days' delay of the annual appropriation for its support, demanded of gentlemen where was the urgent, the imperious necessity which they seemed to suppose existed for passing this bill at the present moment? He trusted that the assembled wisdom of this nation would proceed with greater caution, that the House should know distinctly for what purposes it appropriated the public money. The gentleman from Virginia was entirely satisfied as to the vote he should give on this bill. If he is, said Mr. W., I am not. I had the honor of voting with the gentleman on the question of internal improvement at the last session, on which association with him I congratulate myself. I had doubts of the constitutionality of the power we were called upon to exercise, and, when I have doubts on any such question, I had rather err on the safe side of it. I would at all times abstain from any act, of the correctness of which I was not clearly satisfied. Is the gentleman fully convinced that, in voting for "the pay of the army," he votes for nothing more? Has he not reason to believe that he votes for something else? Unquestionably he has. Shall Congress vote money in the contingent fund for an unconstitutional purpose? For such purpose there is no more right to take money from the contingent fund, than from the appropriation for subsistence or for forage. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. TRIMBLE) had said, that the contingent fund was placed at the discretion of the head of the Government. But if, said Mr. W., from the contingent fund the head of a department pays money improperly or unconstitutionally, we must hold our hands. Mr. W. did not subscribe to this doctrine of discretion and irresponsibility on the part of the Executive officers. He cared not from what fund the expenditure for constructing roads was made, it was equally repugnant to the principles of the Constitution, as announced to Congress by the President himself in his Message at the commencement of the last session. He believed the Constitutional corrective of every abuse to be in this House, and hoped they would not shrink from the exercise of it. Mr. W. made some further remarks, to show that there was no reason for hurrying this bill through the House.

Mr. LOWMEYER, of South Carolina, said he should not have risen, but for the suggestion made by one gentleman, and repeated by another, that the expenditure of money appropriated under the head of contingent expenses of the Army, in paying the soldiers for extra labor in making roads, was illegal. On the contrary, he said, this question had been fairly before the House, and the appropriation made with the express understanding, and previous declaration of the War Department, that a part of it was to be applied to the purpose of paying soldiers for extra duty, for work done on roads. Among the documents presented to the House, when the appropriation was first proposed, a year or two ago, was the Quartermaster's estimate for extra pay for fatigue duty of those soldiers engaged in making military roads. With respect to the expenditure, then, which had taken place under Executive authority, it had been authorized by appropriations made for that purpose, or with the distinct understanding that they were to be so applied. If any member would compare the present estimate with the former appropriation for contingencies, he would find a very considerable diminution. Appropriations for contingencies, however, were only intended to cover expenditures not precisely authorized by law, and which could not be foreseen so as to be provided for; but, where an expenditure, like that on roads, for example, can be anticipated, the object should be distinctly stated in the appropriation. When, however, a sum has been appropriated, under an estimate that one branch of it is made necessary by the extra expenses of the detachments of the Army employed in making roads, Mr. L. said he could not conceive that any censure could attach to the Executive for applying the money so appropriated to that object. It was an usual practice for committees, particularly for those which had an undue portion of labor to perform, to include under one head, or in one bill, provisions which ought to be divided into several; this course, too, frequently was proper, as conducing to brevity and convenience. Whilst he thought the committee not censurable for not having introduced a separate appropriation in the former laws for this object, it was fair to say that he should consider it perfectly proper now to make it a distinct item, because the principle was important, and because there is a very great difference of opinion with respect to the constitutionality of the power. He did not see that there was any particular urgency requiring the House to act upon the bill forthwith; and he therefore hoped time would be given to obtain the requisite information on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, said, as reasons had been offered why the Committee should not now act on this subject, he desired leave to submit to the House some of the reasons which would influence his vote. He was in favor of inquiring, by a distinct call on the proper Department, whether the Executive continues to do that which he has denied that the Congress of the United States has the power to do. If he had no other reason, he would vote for the Committee's rising, to get at this fact. Mr. J. was disposed to protest, too, against other doctrines he had heard to-day. We are told, said he, that we have a right to impeach, but that we have no right to censure the President. For one, I claim the right. This is the grand inquest of the nation; and this House has the right to censure any and every officer, from the President of the United States down to the most subordinate in public employ. He claimed the right, he repeated; he represented a portion of the people of this country—and whenever, in his judgment, any officer of this Government should do wrong, if the wrong amounted not to an act for which he would be liable to legal prosecution, if he (Mr. J.) believed him to be wrong, he claimed the right, and would exercise the right, of censuring him. It is important, said he, that we should exercise it; we represent the people; we speak their voice; their voice shall be heard; that voice shall and will be obeyed. Mr. J. went on to show other reasons why the Committee should rise, founded on the defect of information before the House, particularly as to the expenditures for making roads. What did these roads cost last year? What have they cost since you begun them? These were questions to which answers were required before he gave his consent, &c. He was surprised that such information, as well as of the amount expected to be applied to that object during the ensuing year, was not in possession of the Committee of Ways and Means. He laid it down as a sound axiom, in government, never to render that contingent, which can be made certain. If, he said, we could foresee all the expenses of the Government, and provide specifically for each, it would be best. Some objects of expenditure were so uncertain as not to admit of that course. But it was seen at a glance that there was no reason why the appropriation for making roads should be included in the contingent fund. His honorable colleague was in favor of increasing the appropriation when made specific. Mr. J., on the contrary, desired it to be specific, that he might vote to strike it out altogether. There should not be appropriated to that object, by his vote, one dollar, nor a fraction of a dollar. He had, at the last session, performed a very humble part in endeavoring to assign the reasons why he thought the Constitution had not given the power to Congress to make roads. Having given that vote, he could not now give a vote to sanction an appropriation which he believed would be a violation of that instrument which gave to Congress their being, and conferred on them their powers.

Mr. SMITH said he was much bound to the politeness of the honorable Speaker, for the notice yesterday given him, as the gentleman had today informed the House, that he should call for certain information respecting one of the items of appropriation in the bill. In consequence of that intimation, Mr. S. said, he had addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, to which he had just received an answer,* which he would communicate to the House. Mr. S. then stated substantially the information contained in the documents which he had received.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky., spoke against the Committee's rising. He made some remarks, also, on the power exercised by the Executive, of employing the Army, or any part of it, in the construction of military roads. None, he said, would deny the right to make a bridge by the army, for its own safety in retreat, or for the purpose of crossing a river in pursuit of an enemy; nor the right of making a causeway over a ditch, or over a swamp—and he could see no difference in principle, if the causeway became a paved road on dry ground. The real question for the House to decide now, was whether they would pay the poor soldier, who receives five dollars a month only for his services, an extra ration or allowance for laboring on public works, or whether he should be deprived of this pay, by depriving the Government of the means of paying him. The power to make a bridge, a causeway, or a road, by employing the soldiery on it, would in no manner be affected by this decision. At the last session of Congress, however, what was the decision of this House on the subject of the power of Congress to cause roads to be constructed? Was it not in favor of the power to make military roads as well as commercial roads? Mr. J. said he could not see this lurking harm, this poison to the liberties of the country, in the appropriation referred to; for, if censure or thanks were supposed due to the act of employing the soldiers on the public roads, Mr. J. said he would vote heartily for thanks to the Administration for having done what he considered an acceptable duty. It was obvious why the subject had now presented itself. The late war with Great Britain was not many years past—he hoped it was not forgotten—it had brought to our knowledge the fatal consequences of not having military roads in several parts of our country. The Government, availing itself of this experience, had directed the Army, otherwise reposing in sloth, and contracting the vices of the camp, to be employed to a greater extent in a species of duty in which they had frequently been employed before, but on a smaller scale. There never had been an army, he said, but the contingent fund of its Quartermaster's department had been applied to pay for the extra work of the soldier. Mr. J. was not only ready to vote the required appropriation, but to applaud the Government for having engaged in an undertaking which required it.

After some further remarks, principally explanatory, from Mr. TRIMBLE, and Mr. CLAY, the Committee rose, the usual hour of adjournment having arrived, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to increase the salaries of the Assistants Postmaster General; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BELLINGER, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made a report, which was read; when Mr. B. reported a bill making appropriations for the public buildings; for the purchase of a lot of land, and for furnishing a supply of water, for the use of certain public buildings; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. HERBERT, the Secretary of the Treasury was instructed to report to this House, a statement of the debts, credits and funds of the incorporated banks of the District of Columbia, required by the 19th section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks, in the District of Columbia, and to prevent the circulation of the notes of unincorporated associations within the District."

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of enacting a law, to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the laws of nations.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a list of the names of persons to whom patents have been granted, for any useful invention, during the year ending the 31st day of December, 1818; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Frederick Brown," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of the House.

The amendments were read and concurred in by the House.

EXTRACT FROM REGULATIONS.

"The non-commissioned officers and privates, who may be drawn, as artificers, to work constantly on fortifications, bridges, barracks, roads, or other public works, for a term of not less than ten days, Sundays excepted, shall be allowed, for each day's actual labor, fourteen cents, and one gill of spirits each, in addition to their pay and rations."

"Other non-commissioned officers and privates, not artificers, who shall be drawn for constant labor on fortifications, roads, bridges, barracks, or other public works, for a term of not less than ten days, Sundays excepted, shall be allowed, for each day's actual labor, ten cents, and one gill of spirits each, in addition to their pay and rations."

The above regulation established in 1808.

"Non-commissioned officers and privates, employed at work on fortifications, in surveys, in cutting roads, and other constant labor, will be allowed fifteen cents, and an extra gill of whiskey, per day, while so employed, which will be paid by the officer or agent disbursing the contingent expenses of the work or expedition."

The above regulation established in 1816.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Hall Jervey passed through a Committee of the Whole, received an amendment, and was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. MERCER submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report to this House a bill to reduce, to one, the number of Major Generals of the Army of the United States.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, the Secretary of War was directed to include in the report of the strength of the army, called for by the resolution of yesterday, the amount, in value, if any, of the extra compensation in the subsistence, clothing, or pay, allowed the troops, for extra labor during the year, ending the 30th of October last, on fatigue duties, distinguishing that which has been bestowed in compensation for labor on roads.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Military Appropriation bill—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that the debate had taken a course yesterday wholly unusual. The bill had scarcely been read through, when the honorable Speaker took the floor, and, after a few remarks, diverged into a subject which had been fully discussed at the last session, to wit: that of internal improvements. This called up other gentlemen to justify their votes on that subject; and thus the bill before the Committee had been left out of view. The custom had ever been, Mr. S. said, for the chairman of a committee who reports a bill to present a view of its objects, and to explain such parts of it as, in his opinion, might require explanation. He would now perform that duty, and would not permit himself to be drawn into a discussion of the Seminole war—the conduct of General Jackson—internal improvements, or any other extraneous subject.

The bill before the Committee of the Whole, Mr. S. proceeded to say, is a bill making appropriations for the military service of the current year. The estimates on which the bill was founded were presented on the 2d of December, and printed on the 15th. The Committee of Ways and Means, anxious to pass the appropriation bill, entered immediately on the subject, and directed letters to be addressed to the Secretary of War for information on certain points; to which they received the Secretary's answer (now in print) on the 19th of December, accompanied by the original documents on which his estimates had been formed. The bill was reported on the 22d of December—the holidays then intervened—and this, Mr. S. said, would be an answer to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERCER,) and would convince him that proper industry had been used by the committee. One of the original papers had been printed, by which that gentleman might be informed that great and expensive fortifications had been commenced, and others about to be commenced. Those, said Mr. S., for New Orleans and its vicinity, will cost $1,800,- 000; those for the Chesapeake, $3,000,000; for the Delaware, $300,000; for New York, $275,000; for Rouse's point, (Lake Champlain,) $200,000. This last, said Mr. S., will not be executed until it is ascertained whether that point will fall within the boundary of the United States. Here Mr. S. took a view of the security which those fortifications would give to the United States—passed a handsome compliment to the abilities and industry of the engineer, (General Bernard,) and called on gentlemen to remember that, by voting the supply, they were approbating those fortifications—the aggregate cost of which would amount at least to five and a half millions. Mr. S. observed, that the Committee of Ways and Means had not conceived it necessary to print any other of the documents; they were such as had been annually laid before the House, and could be seen by any gentleman; and that he, or some of the Committee of Ways and Means, would explain them with pleasure at the request of any member.

The first item in the bill, Mr. S. continued, was for the pay of the Army; in that no extra pay was introduced; it was simply for the pay, as authorized by the existing laws. The sum estimated to be necessary was $1,299,000. It was found, however, that there was an unexpended balance of $300,000; and the bill was filled in consequence with one million. The second item, Mr. S. said, was for subsistence. An error had been made in filling up the blank, which would be corrected; the sum ought to have been $789,213, which, with $200,000 appropriated by a special law during the present session, and a presumed gain by the new mode of supply by commissariat, instead of by contract, of $146,524, would make the sum stated in the estimate. The Secretary of War, Mr. S. said, had informed the committee that $400,000 would be sufficient for the purchase of clothing. This was a deduction from the estimate of $49,530, and the blank had accordingly been filled up with $400,000. The estimate required $92,500 for bounties and premiums. On inquiry, however, it was found that there was an unexpended balance of the last year of $30,000, and the sum proposed for that item in the bill was, accordingly, $62,500. The Quartermaster's department, Mr. S. continued, is always an expensive one. The present Quartermaster General has lately come into the office; he appeared to be a man of system, and no doubt was entertained that, when he had attained a complete knowledge of the department, he would economize as far as possible. At present, however, that officer was obliged to rely for his statements on those of the last year, which amounted to $460,000. He required an addition of $49,000 for the transportation of provisions; that expenditure arose from its being the duty of this Quartermaster to transport the provisions from the place of purchase to that of consumption, and was properly a charge upon the new system of supply; it was formerly paid by the contractors. He also requires $50,000 for the construction of barracks and storehouses, to wit:

The arrearages arising from a deficiency in certain appropriations of the last year, Mr. S. said, would be found in the estimate; but, from two letters from the Secretary, (which were read,) the sum required was $126,207, and the estimate would be so filled. The estimate, Mr. S. said, required $838,000 for fortifications. It would be found that $200,000, intended for Rouse's point, would not be wanted, as before observed, until it was decided whether that point be within the boundary of the United States. The Secretary's letter (before the Committee) shows an unexpended balance of $600,000. The Committee of Ways and Means conceived that $1,100,000 was as much as could be expended during the year; they have, therefore, reduced that item to the sum in the bill of $500,000, being a deduction of $338,000. The estimate for arsenals, Mr. S. said, had been reduced by the Committee of Ways and Means $55,000, which would be explained when the specific item came under consideration. The reductions proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, from the estimates, amounted to $918,524. The other items in the bill were conformable, Mr. S. said, to the estimates, and would be explained when under consideration. Mr. S. said he hoped, from this view of the subject, it would appear that the Committee of Ways and Means had not been inattentive to their duty. The business of a public nature was sufficient for any one committee; but that of private claims, also referred to them, was very great; and if, with such a mass pressing upon them, any subject should escape them, a fair apology for the committee would offer itself to every mind.

The honorable Speaker, Mr. S. said, had informed the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that he meant to make a point in the extra pay allowance to soldiers employed on military roads. No such item being among the papers submitted to the committee, Mr. S. said, he had written to the Secretary of War for information; his answer was received late yesterday; had been read, and was now before every member. There was, however, Mr. S. observed, among the papers of the Quartermaster, an estimate for repairs of barracks, quarters, and storehouses, at fifty-nine posts, including extra pay to soldiers—the purchase of tools, plank, nails, bricks, lime, timber, and other articles, of $30,000. The articles were so many, Mr. S. said, and the sum so small, that it did not occur to the committee that any part of it was intended for extra pay for working on military roads. The subject, Mr. S. continued, was treated as if it were entirely novel; but the bill was precisely such as had been passed for many years. Was it now, for the first time, known to the honorable Speaker,

Mr. S. asked, that extra pay had been allowed to soldiers employed on military roads? Did he not recollect that the same subject was before Congress for the three last years? In 1816, a resolution of the House called for the rules and regulations of the Army; among these was an allowance of extra pay and liquor to soldiers when employed on barracks, fortifications, and roads; and a law passed on the 24th of April, legalizing these regulations. Mr. S. here read the following from the 9th section of the act: "That the regulations in force before the reduction of the Army, be recognised as far as the same shall be found applicable to the service—subject, however, to such alterations as the Secretary of War may adopt, with the approbation of the President." Here, then, said Mr. S., the statute vests the President with the power to employ the soldiers, and to allow them extra pay when at work on military roads, and completely absolves him from all censure for so doing. But suppose, said Mr. S., there had been no law, the President would have been justified by the usage of all armies. It may be called the common law of armies to employ the soldiers on fortifications and military roads, and to allow them extra pay. During the Revolutionary war, extra liquor was allowed, under an order of the commanding General; and, as early as 1808, it was made a regulation of the War Department to allow extra pay and liquor; and, although well known, had never before been questioned.

Mr. S. said that he had a right to complain of the novel proceeding on this occasion. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was charged by the honorable Speaker with failing to give the necessary information to the House; that he had asked for bread, and the committee gave him a stone. In reply to this, Mr. S. said it would be recollected that the Speaker rose immediately after the bill had been read by the Clerk, and thus wholly precluded him, or any other member of the Committee of Ways and Means, from furnishing the information they possessed to the Committee of the Whole; but he hoped the view now given would be satisfactory. If, however, any further information was required by any member, it would be given, with pleasure, by him or some other member of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, rose to request information on a question of practice. How long, asked Mr. J., has it been the custom of the Committee of Ways and Means to report bills of appropriation with the blanks filled up? Was this, he continued, not a dangerous practice? Ought the sums of an appropriation bill to be inserted by any authority but that of the House of Representatives itself? By this practice, Mr. J. said, the Committee of Ways and Means, taking the estimates from the Executive departments, proceeds to make the appropriations, without consulting the House. If, said he, this House were merely a recording synod for the heads of departments, the practice would be a very good one; but, as the representatives of the people, who alone have the right to appropriate the people's money, every bill should be reported to us in blank; it would then devolve on the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to show to the House that such sums as he asked for were necessary for the public service. But, reported as the bills now were, he said, filled up with the sums deemed proper by the committee, it threw the burden of proof on those who might oppose any appropriation, that it was improper, or that the proposed amount was unnecessary, and a different one preferable. In this Government, Mr. J. said, where there was the freest interchange between all the officers of the Government, and every facility to the communication of information, ought the House to shrink from its duty of investigating appropriations, and say that the want of facts rendered such investigation impossible? Or do we, said he, come down here to vote for any bill which shall be reported to us, filled up with round numbers? No; first satisfy my judgment, said he, that these sums are necessary, before I vote for them; and to do this it is the duty of the chairman of the Committee of Finance. The practice, Mr. J. said, to which he objected, was of modern date; it was, he believed, not more than two or three years since the innovation was made; but he hoped to see no more of it. He hoped that all bills would hereafter be reported in blank, and the chairman of the committee be prepared to show to the House how those blanks ought to be filled. It seemed that if an opportunity had offered yesterday, the gentleman (Mr. SMITH) would have been able to shed on it that ray of light which had to-day illumined the House; to have dispelled all the darkness which rested on this subject, and enabled the House to march steadily to its object. But, even now, Mr. J. said, he was not satisfied, after all the gentleman's explanations, and after his being assisted by the letter which had been received from the Secretary of War, of the propriety of this appropriation. And this letter—what was it? It informs us, said Mr. J., that for the construction of roads about $10,000 are wanted; and that if this appropriation be deemed inexpedient, this amount may be stricken out. How many miles of turnpike road, Mr. J. asked, was this sum expected to make? What did the superintendent of the Cumberland road state at the last session? That it cost about $16,000 to make a mile of that road. And are we, said Mr. J., to be amused with a mile of turnpike road? Is this the mighty object which, as the National Intelligencer informs us, raised a breeze in the House yesterday, and disturbed the calm which nothing before had the power to interrupt? Could gentlemen be serious, he asked, on this occasion, or look at this object without a smile? He should like to know if it was intended, with these $10,000, to make half a mile, three quarters, or a whole mile of road? For himself, Mr. J. said, he would not allow them to make even a single mile. And though the sum required might be as dust in the balance, he would give not a dollar for this purpose, because he believed the House had no right to make the appropriation. We have, said Mr. J., the opinion of the Chief Magistrate that we have not the right; and can the attribute attach to the Executive officer of denying to the Legislature the power to do a thing, and yet do that himself which he has said the Constitution gives us no power to do? Considering the millions upon millions annually expended in this country, the amount of this appropriation was as nothing; yet, he repeated, were it but a single dollar, he would not sacrifice principle by voting it for such an object.

Mr. LOWMEAS spoke briefly as to the practice of the House respecting appropriation bills. The estimates of appropriations necessary for defraying the expenses of each year were furnished, he said, by the proper departments, and laid before the House. The Committee of Ways and Means, taking the estimates into consideration, either concurred in them, or agreed to diminish, to add to, or to reject them. In all these cases, Mr. L. asked, was it not fairer, as well as more convenient, that, by reporting the bill with the sums specifically stated, the House should have notice of any proposed variation from the estimate, than that they should be taken by surprise when the House was called upon to fill blanks in the bill? Such, at least, was his impression, and such precisely the effect of the innovation of which the gentlemen complained. At the same time that the advantage was afforded of an opportunity for examination, it was perfectly competent to any gentleman to take exception to any item of the bill, and require a question to be taken on it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, thanked the gentleman from South Carolina for the view he had taken of the practice of the House, but was free to say that his opinion of the subject was yet not at all changed. Were any facts, he asked, presented to the Committee of Ways and Means which were not also imparted to the House? He presumed not. It was the duty of every member to examine for himself this information, to investigate the estimates of the departments, and make himself acquainted with all the information communicated; and he would reflect upon no gentleman of the House so far as to believe that he had not performed this duty. How, then, could the House be taken by surprise? How were men of common intelligence, capable of forming conclusions from plain facts, to be found unprepared, with all the necessary information before them? According to the old mode of proceeding, and he still thought it the proper one, Mr. J. said it would be necessary for the chairman of the committee to show the necessity of an appropriation before he could call on the House to vote it. When he demanded a sum for any object, he ought to be able to show that it is necessary; and by a clear reasoning to prove that his result is right. There were indeed some propositions so clear as to need no elucidation. No man doubted that the whole is equal to its parts, or that two and two make four. I see the honorable gentleman smile, said Mr. J. A man may smile and smile—[Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that if Mr.

J. referred to him, he assured him that his smile was excited by an expression of a gentleman on his left, and not by anything which had fallen from Mr. J.—I thank the gentleman, said Mr. J.; it is a matter of perfect indifference to me, said he, whether I am attended to by the gentleman or not; I am addressing the House, and not the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He was, he said, indifferent to the opinions of any man whilst doing his duty, nor should he be driven from his object. He stood here the humble Representative of a portion of the people of this country, and, whilst he stood here, should represent faithfully, at least as far as he was capable, their interests; he would speak their choice; he would act up to their will and judgment, whatever should be the consequences. Wherever any puny efforts should be made to impede him in the performance of this duty, he should treat them with scorn and derision.

Mr. TAYLOR took a short view of the practice which had, at different times, prevailed in the House in acting on appropriation bills. Originally they were reported in blank, and the sums to fill the blanks were separately moved by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. Subsequently it was the practice to place before the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole the different sums called for, and which he considered as having been separately moved to fill the blanks in the bill. The next step was, to print the sums in the bill itself, but the bill was still considered as in blank, and the Chair continued to put the question on each particular appropriation, as if motions were made for them individually. This practice, Mr. T. hoped, would continue in preference to the present custom of considering the sum with which a blank was filled, as acquiesced in, without putting the question, unless objected to.

The CHAIRMAN stated that, unless objected to, he should consider this as the sense of the Committee, and resume the practice, suggested by Mr. TAYLOR, of putting the question separately on every item of the bill. He accordingly announced the question on the appropriation now under consideration, viz: one million dollars for the pay of the Army; and after some brief conversation, which showed that it was the established pay only of the army that was intended in this appropriation, the question being put thereon, it was decided in the affirmative.

The appropriation of $550,000 for the Quartermaster's department being next stated from the Chair—

Mr. TRIMBLE moved to deduct therefrom ten thousand dollars, the amount stated by the Secretary of War to be necessary for extra pay to soldiers employed in fatigue labor on roads, &c. This motion, Mr. T. said, he made with the view, if it prevailed, of moving this sum as a separate and distinct appropriation in the bill, expressing its object, &c.

This motion was agreed to, and

Mr. TRIMBLE accordingly moved to amend the bill, by inserting, after the appropriation for the Quartermaster's department, the following: "For extra pay to non-commissioned officers and soldiers employed in constructing and repairing military roads, ten thousand dollars." Having submitted his motion, Mr. T. proceeded to show, by referring to the letter of the Secretary of War, that this appropriation was in conformity to existing laws. He referred to the regulations of 1808 and of 1816, of the War Department, fixing this extra allowance by an act of Congress, as conclusive with regard to its legality; but understanding, he said, that an appropriation for making roads, made in any shape, equally involved the power to make roads, he offered this motion in order to bring the question fairly before the Committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, moved to amend the proposition by inserting, after "roads," the words on "barracks and other public works."

Mr. CLAY hoped that this motion would not be insisted on, and, if insisted on, would not prevail. The object in view was, to present the simple, un-mixed proposition whether the Executive has the power to employ the money of the country in constructing roads; if associated with the company proposed, (the amendment,) it would make the sense of the committee equivocal on the important question presented by the motion of Mr. TRIMBLE. For that motion, Mr. C. said, he meant to vote. It would declare by a formal act that it was competent, by the grants of power, for Congress to authorize such works. Mr. C. said he thought Congress had been wanting in its duty in delaying so long to legislate on this subject. It was proper to pass a bill and present it to the President, and if he refused to sanction it, then, Mr. C. declared, he had no hesitation in avowing he should be ready to proceed to hostilities with the President on this point, and withhold every appropriation until he conceded the point. But, Mr. C. said, he should not deem it proper to proceed to extremities with the Chief Magistrate on this score until he had first fairly presented to him a bill appropriating money for the purpose, and saying to him, here it is—sign it or not sign it. He differed from those who believed the President would refuse to sign such a bill. He regarded the opinion announced by the President in the Message to Congress, at the last session, as an opinion extra-judicial. The judge had no right to decide in the matter. Let us make the case, said Mr. C., and present it fairly before him; then, if he says we have not the power, I am ready to reply to him—neither have you. But, Mr. C. repeated, there was little reason to presume, from the opinion he had expressed, that the President would refuse to sanction such a bill, as his conduct had been in direct opposition to that opinion. On the contrary he had acted in exact conformity to the opinion declared by this House in relation to the powers of the General Government to construct roads, &c. It was too much to anticipate, that, after this House had exerted its utmost faculties in maturing a bill, the President would refuse to sign it. Mr. C. hoped that a bill making appropriations for internal improvements would be reported. He was willing to take one in the same shape of that which had already once passed this House, and try whether the President would refuse to it his assent, and deny to Congress the power of enacting it. Let us not, said Mr. C., apply to our fears for counsel, but put the question at once fairly and properly to the President.

Mr. C. had yet a stronger reason, he said, for approving the proposition to insert a specific appropriation for this object in the present bill. He thought the mode of making compensation for this extra labor, by the President or Heads of Department, at their discretion, however much he respected those men, to be a dangerous mode, an unconstitutional mode, and one, under every view, improper. It taught the army to direct their views elsewhere, instead of to this House, for compensation and reward. This he thought an important consideration. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) must excuse him for differing from him on this subject. The gentleman talks, said Mr. C., of the common law of the army. The common law of the army! This common law, sir, is always resorted to in extremities: in dangerous times it is resorted to to justify the abuse of power. When a sedition law was to be passed, this common law was the argument for it; now, when it is to justify an allowance of extra pay to the army, the common law is brought up. What common law is it? Is it European—is it English, French, or what is it? Mr. C. said, he knew it not. He had always understood it was proper and legitimate for all armies to make military roads, and it was under that impression he wished the compensation for such labor to be appropriated by law. Allow the President or the head of a Department to make this compensation, to apply the public money to this purpose at their discretion, and they may go on to other objects also. There was, indeed, no limit to which they might not go. Mr. C. said he meant no disrespect to the head of the War Department; on the contrary, he entertained for him the profoundest respect. He was, he said, no flatterer; he had not yet learned the practice of Courts: the expression of his respect for that gentleman was forced from him by the feelings of his heart, and he was proud to acknowledge them. This extra compensation, it seemed, was according to the regulations adopted; but he hoped this would not be contended for as a sufficient authority for it. Extra allowance, Mr. C. said, might be proper, but it ought to be for Congress to make it; and the maximum, at least, if not the object of it, ought to be fixed by Congress. Although the act of 1816 might, in express terms, recognise these regulations, there was no member, he imagined, who voted for it, who thought its exercise was to be unconstitutional transferred from the Legislature to the Executive. It was far from his intention, Mr. C. said, to enter into the interesting question (the transactions of the Seminole war) touched on yesterday. A proper occasion he hoped would present itself for considering that subject; as he should consider the Legislature wanting in its duty if it permitted the session to pass without the expression of an opinion on it. But when it comes before us in the shape of a direct proposition, let us meet it as men, and pronounce on it properly. He had no idea of concurring with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERCER,) as to indicating the opinion of this House, respecting the conduct of a military officer, by withholding his pay. This course would be inexpedient also, because it would leave their opinion in doubt, and the Executive might be at a loss, if the pay of one of the Major Generals were withheld, to know which to retain. Mr. C. thought it was proper at least for Congress to express an opinion on this subject, if not to legislate on it. He would, he admitted, not pass a censure upon the Chief Magistrate, but he would have the House to express the opinion, and say, there it is, operate on whom it may. Would not the course suggested yesterday, he asked, express an indirect censure on the Executive by withholding the pay of the officer, and thus compelling the Executive to dismiss him? It certainly would. But, Mr. C. repeated, this was not the occasion for going into that question.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in reply to Mr. CLAY's question of what was the common law of the army, observed that what he alluded to was this, that a certain practice had prevailed in the army, from the Revolutionary war down to this time. In the war of the Revolution it was common for the commander to allow extra pay to the soldiers for labor performed on permanent works, fortifications, &c. It was usual, also, when the soldiers were ordered on extra duty, on any hard service, for the commander to order them double rations of drink, &c. This was still the case: the regulations of the War Department, respecting extra pay, rations, &c. had been formerly printed and laid on the tables of the members, and the law of 1816 was intended to embrace these regulations. As to the common law, Mr. S. said there was once a common law in Congress: it was common law to allow the members something to drink with their water. It was true, that was done away; but now, said he, by the same kind of common law we are supplied with pen-knives, &c., and whatever thus became general usage was common law.

Mr. MERCER made a few remarks on the motion of Mr. BUTLER, which he disapproved. Having concluded these observations, he said that, whilst up, he had to thank the honorable Speaker for the opportunity of now making an explanation, which he had intended to give in a subsequent stage of the proceedings. And, first, he assured the Speaker that whatever opinion he should express on the conduct of the army in the Seminole war, he should travel directly to his object. I mean not, said he, to mince anything I shall say; and shall in that respect differ probably from the Speaker, so far only as that honorable member always has it more in his power than I to do justice to his subject and to his abilities. Mr. M. said he was misunderstood yesterday. He did not intend to say that it was proper to reduce the appropriation for the pay of the army with the view to express an opinion of the conduct of the commander of the army: he had meant only to suggest the propriety of the bill's being allowed to rest on the table until the whole subject of the army to be sustained by the appropriations contained in it should be decided. A period might occur—he did not say that this was such a one—when the abuses in the military department should be such as to justify the House in withholding all appropriations. But it must be a great and dire necessity. It would have been inconsistent indeed in him, he said, to sustain, by the proposition it had been supposed he meant to make, a doctrine which he had opposed at the last session. He thought the House had no right to censure an officer by withholding appropriations for his pay. He should, he said, have the same hesitation in withholding payment from a military officer, by way of censuring him, as from a judge, and from a judge as from a major general. No; his object was to let the subject rest until the military committee should have made their report; until, too, he could have tried the sense of the House on a proposition he had in his pocket these ten days, and the existence of which he had before intimated. He now read it, (being the same he laid on the table subsequently, to reduce the number of major generals in the army to one.) If this was not a direct march to his object he would thank the honorable Speaker to point the way, and he would trail a pike after him with all his heart. He had thus disclosed his object, not certainly to introduce a discussion of the subject, but to show why this bill ought not now to have been pressed on the House, particularly when, from the surpluses of last year's appropriations, there was no urgent occasion for it, &c. He was in favor of laying the bill on the table until an opportunity was given for the inquiry whether the conduct of the army had not been such as to require the interposition of this House.

Mr. SYROTHER said, it was with reluctance he offered himself to the attention of the House, at this time; and he should not have done it, if it had not been that remarks had been made, bearing on a delicate subject, and that silence might be considered as an acquiescence in the course and bearing of those observations. In noticing them, he should not attempt to reply to them in detail; he deemed it unnecessary to do so; but, without being the champion of the Administration, or of General Jackson, he must express the surprise with which he had heard the remarks of the Speaker, and of his honorable colleague. In the first place, he could not conceive what impropriety there could be in the Executive having given extra pay to soldiers for labor on public works, when such an allowance had been expressly authorized by law, as had been shown. And, in regard to the question presented by the proposition now before the House, was there not, Mr. S. asked, a wide distinction between roads for common purposes, and a military road for facilitating the march of armies and the transportation of munitions of war? Was there not a wide difference between the bill which passed a few sessions ago, for establishing a fund for the purposes of internal improvement, and the acts of the Executive in regard to the Cumberland road? Congress claimed no sovereign power over the Cumberland road; but the rejected bill did contemplate the giving to the Government a sovereign power over the roads to be constructed under it, and thus to infringe on the rights of the States. This, he said, was a principle which the Executive had not recognised, in giving its sanction to the bill for continuing the Cumberland road. So far from it, it was said, that the objection made to the road passing through his land, by a person living near Wheeling, had proved an insuperable obstacle to the prosecution of a part of that road; and, unless this individual should yield to the general good and to his own interest, that the work must be at an end. That the military power should be subservient to the civil, was an axiom so unquestionable, a principle so vital, that every child in the land knew and acknowledged it. He did not, however, intend to go into an argument respecting the powers of the Government in regard to internal improvement; the time might arrive in this session for an argument on that subject. But, there was not a man who had read the Constitution of the United States, who would hesitate as to the right of the Government to make military roads, where necessary to facilitate the march of armies.

Now, said Mr. S. for my honorable colleague, who yesterday remarked, that he had passed sleepless nights in consequence of his horror of the Seminole war—that he had been so miserable, in consequence of Mr. Secretary Adams's letter, as to have sought in vain this solace of the unhappy, Mr. S. said he should like to know whether the sympathies of his colleague on this occasion had been excited by the groans of the widow and the cries of the orphan; by the bleeding scalps of the infant murdered in the cradle, and of its mother butchered by its side—were these the considerations which had harrowed his soul with horror? Or, was it the infliction of exemplary punishment on those who had instigated the savages to these barbarous deeds? Mr. S. flattered himself that it was the sufferings and injuries of our frontier inhabitants, and not the punishment of the authors of them, that was the source of his painful sensations. He had, he said, anticipated the discussion, which must take place during the session on the subject of the Seminole war, thus far, because it seemed proper to him, whilst invective appeared to be bursting forth in defiance of every effort to restrain it, against the hero who had crowned his country with glory, and prevented an important part of the Union from being severed from the Government, that the nation ought to know that there were numbers in this House prepared to step forth to defend him. The time would arrive, as had been remarked by the honorable Speaker; and, humble as he was, he felt himself able to enter the lists, on this occasion, with an Ajax or a Samson, and trust to the justice of the cause for the palm of victory. He should not now open a discussion on this subject; but, come when it may, said he, I shall not hesitate, careless of the consequences, to do what I believe to be my duty. The patriotism which animates the bosom of General Jackson will be an ample shield for the hero, who has achieved immortality for himself, and shed the brightest lustre on the arms of his country.

Mr. S. then adverted to other topics introduced into the debate, most of which he considered irrelevant, and, if entered into here, inexhaustible. No man doubted, he said, the power of the Executive to cause to be made roads necessary for military operations; and no intimation had been given to this House of an opinion that this power had been improperly exercised. He, therefore, did not see that the proposition embraced any difficulty, or called for the discussion which had grown out of it. Acting in co-operation with the valuable officer at the head of the War Department, who, in the great crisis of our affairs, had gone hand in hand with the honorable Speaker, Mr. S. had no doubt the Executive would so apply the money appropriated as to justify the expenditure.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, thought the amendment he had proposed to Mr. TRIMBLE's motion was preferable; it was more consistent with the suggestion in the letter of the Secretary of War, which embraced all the objects of extra pay, as well that for working on roads as others, &c.

Mr. TRIMBLE thought the amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER would subject the appropriation to the same objections as when it was made in the former mode, under the general head of contingencies; and he advocated at some length the propriety of making distinct and specific appropriations in all cases in which it could be done; more especially in this case. Mr. T. said he would not touch upon the subject of the Seminole war, which had been introduced into the present discussion, or give an opinion whether the President had acted right or wrong in applying the public money in making or repairing roads by the soldiers. As, however, the House had appropriated, by the act of 1816, money for this object, he would say, that the power had been, in his opinion, justifiably exercised. In this case he would apply to the Executive a line of Goldsmith, and say that—

and that the country would have great cause to congratulate itself on its good fortune, if, in all time to come, it only found the Executive head using bad reasons for wise measures. He was opposed to controlling the Executive, or any other officer of the Government, by withholding a proper approbation from the Government. That was a proceeding which might be proper in monarchies, or despotisms, where the will of the sovereign could not be otherwise resisted, but it did not comport with the nature or the dignity of republican government, or with the responsibility which belonged to its several branches. He would, he repeated, never withhold, for any such purpose as that alluded to, an appropriation, when required for proper objects.

Mr. MILLER, of South Carolina, thought the principle involved in this discussion was, whether an appropriation should be made for extra pay to the army, for labor on public works. The Secretary of War had distinctly told the House that this amount was wanted for extra pay for labor on barracks, &c., as well as roads; but the committee had not informed the House how much would be wanted for each particular object, and therefore the appropriations could not well be separated. As the $10,000 were not considered necessary for roads alone, he would vote for Mr. BUTLER's amendment, so as to include all the objects of extra pay in one appropriation.

Mr. REED, of Maryland, was favorable to Mr. BUTLER's amendment, because if $10,000 be appropriated for roads alone, the Secretary of War would take as much more as he thought necessary for barracks, &c., if not incorporated in this appropriation, because he is already authorized by law to employ the public money on those objects. Mr. R. thought it very proper for the soldiers to be employed in constructing and repairing barracks, &c., but he did not think it right to expend the money in paying them extra pay for such labor; an extra ration might be given, but soldiers thus employed, on what was called extra labor, were exempted from all other duty at the time, and he did not think they ought to receive extra pay for it—it was the proper duty of the army to construct bridges or roads for itself to pass over.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, said, he should like to know where these roads were, about which so much had been said. He was not more partial to one part of the country than another; but the House was as competent to decide where roads ought to be made, as the War Department, or any one else. He repeated, he should be glad to know where the roads were which had been commenced, how far they were towards completion, and whether $10,000 was enough for the object.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, without attempting to afford full information on this point of inquiry, referred, in reply, to the road now making by the soldiers from Sackett's Harbor; that authorized at the last session through the Cherokee country; and, if he was not mistaken, there was one in the gentleman's own State (Ohio.)

After some further conversation on Mr. BUTLER's motion, the question was taken thereon, and decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. RHEA then rose to offer an amendment. It was well known, he said, that the sum of $10,000 could be employed, in some parts of the country, to very great advantage in making roads. He, therefore, moved to amend the proposition, by inserting, "in any one of the Territories of the United States." Mr. R. would not now touch the great question of internal improvements, but he argued for some time, and referred to many facts and the experience of the late wars in the South to show how necessary some roads were in that section, how much they would have saved to the country. By applying the appropriation in making roads in the Territories, the Constitutional difficulty would be avoided by those who doubted the power, though he did not propose this course to avoid the main question; for which he was prepared whenever it should properly come up. As to General Jackson and the Seminole war, it would be time enough to talk about that when the subject properly came before the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, this amendment would defeat the whole object of the appropriation, because it would confine the military roads entirely to the Territories.

Mr. RHEA's motion was lost without a division.

Mr. STORRS then moved to strike out of the proposition the word "military," and thus bring the question before the Committee in its broadest shape. He knew not what this term "military" meant. Did it mean a road exclusively military? There was in New York a road which the soldiers had been employed to repair; but the word "military" here was without meaning. If there were any roads made by the army for its exclusive use, they would properly be military roads, but there were none such. By putting the question on the broad ground he proposed, Mr. S. said, it would leave it out of the power of the President to draw a line of distinction between military and other roads, and he would thus be obliged to express his opinion decisively and unequivocally.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, asked the gentleman to reflect for a moment on the effect of his motion. It would go to appropriate $10,000 for roads for the whole country, and to employ the soldiers of the army on all the roads of the United States. He thought that such an amendment would be obviously improper.

Mr. STORR's motion was lost—ayes 50; and.

The question being taken on Mr. TRIMBLE's motion, it was decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

The Committee, after some further progress in the bill, rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 8.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Moss; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to appropriate a fund for internal improvements; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Hall Jervey," was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILKIN, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were directed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law, for the payment to Joseph Merrill, assignee of John Carman, certificate, No. 12,171, dated 1st January, 1782, signed Timothy Pickering, Quartermaster General, to secure to the said John Carman, or his order, the payment in specie, of 209 dollars, with interest at six per centum per annum, until paid.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House having again gone into Committee of the Whole, proceeded in filling up the remaining blanks of the military appropriation bill; and, having gone through it, they took up the bill "respecting the Military Establishment." The Committee subsequently rose and reported the appropriation bill, as amended, to the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, conceiving there was no necessity for acting on this bill immediately, as the unexpended surplus of last year's appropriation would be sufficient for present purposes, moved to lay the bill on the table. There were propositions before the House, not yet decided, which materially affected the provisions of this bill. He hoped to see the Military Establishment reduced; and, until that question was decided, he wished this bill to lie on the table, as some of its appropriations might become unnecessary. At any rate, the bill could be taken up at any time, as it had now passed through the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made some remarks in reply, to show the improbability of a reduction of the Army at present; and, even if there were any chance of effecting that object, that there would be no impropriety in at once passing this bill. If the bill were not now passed, it would produce much trouble and inconvenience in transferring the surplus from one object to others for which it might be wanted, &c. It would be useless to lay the bill over from day to day, and give rise to fresh discussion, when every mind was made up on the subject.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was rejected, by a large majority; and

After some further conversation, rather than debate, between Mr. COLSTON and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, on the anticipated superiority of the commissariat over the contract system of subsistence, in point of economy, which Mr. C. could not find demonstrated by the estimates, and was therefore somewhat incredulous about—

All the amendments of the Committee of the Whole were agreed to by the House, with the exception of that which made a distinct appropriation of ten thousand dollars for extra pay to soldiers for repairing and constructing military roads. The question being stated on concurring with the Committee of the Whole to this amendment—

Mr. PITKIN wished to know what military roads were—where any of them were to be found, and by whom their construction had been authorized. The principle by which the House had been governed, Mr. P. said, was, when they appropriated money, it was always for objects authorized distinctly by law, and to be employed on these objects alone. If for fortifications, for instance, it was found that they were explicitly ordered, and the particular plans of their erection generally pointed out. If this course, in any case, was departed from, the estimates were always previously furnished by the proper department, and the House authorized the expenditure or not; the Executive could only apply the money to the objects which had been mentioned and sanctioned by the House; and so with arsenals at particular points—there was no discretion left with the Executive. As to military roads, there was no such thing known in this country; but, if this appropriation passed, Mr. P. asked if it would not be granting to the Executive, by implication, if not in express terms, the power of making military roads where he pleased, independently of the approbation of this House? And if this right of making military roads were surrendered, he asked if it did not follow that they had a right also to make any other roads and canals? No, Mr. P. said; if there was any such power, it was in Congress, and not in the Executive. He would not venture into the question whether this power resided in Congress; but, whatever powers Congress possessed, he was not for giving them by implication to the President of the United States. In time of war, Mr. P. said, the President might do many things which, in time of peace, he would not be justifiable in doing. The declaration of war conferred on him this extraordinary power. For the purposes of protection, of defence, or for annoying the common enemy, he might destroy a man's house, his garden, &c., without the owner's consent. This power was conveyed by Congress to the President, by the proclamation of war. The right of constructing a military road might be exercised by the President in time of war, but this right did not follow in time of peace. It was said, on this subject, with some plausibility, that in peace we ought to prepare for war—that we should have good roads prepared for the Army to move on, &c.; but did it follow that, if this was proper, the power belonged to the President; that he, in effect, had the power to decide where it was proper to strike a blow, and what Power ought to be attacked? whether it should be Canada, or Florida, or Mexico, which it was proper to assail? For, Mr. P. argued, this discretion would virtually follow the power to select the points for military roads, and would certainly give the President the privilege of declaring where an attack ought to be made, if not the power of declaring war. This, Mr. P. said, was a great and important question. If the appropriation was to be made, ought not the House, he asked, also to say where the road should be made? If this practice was departed from, it would, he said, be a most important departure. In the case of the Cumberland road, the law designated its route, and required the consent of the States through which it passed. So also with the road through the Cherokee country—its route was fixed by law. Ought this discretion, Mr. P. asked, now to be given up to the President? He would give it to no man; for, he repeated, if the President was allowed to lay out and make a military road where he pleased, he might, with the same propriety, make military canals. In truth, Mr. P. said, there was no such thing in this country as military roads, and he hoped we should never have any, strictly so. We know, said he, what military roads were with the Romans—they were a military nation, and made roads in every direction for their legions to pass over. Mr. P. wished also to know what was meant by "constructing?" Had any road been marked out and designated, and nothing was wanted now but money to complete it? No such thing. It gave the complete power to the President to make a road wherever he pleased, without obtaining the consent of the State, or of the proprietor of the soil. It was said, Mr. P. continued, that application of money, in this way, had been sanctioned in some side-way manner by this House; but he did not recollect that it had been sanctioned, or that the subject had even been discussed in this House. Sure he was, that, when he voted for the act of 1816, referred to, he had no idea that he was giving any such power to the President of the United States. To employ the soldiers to repair barracks and other public works, was right and proper, because those objects were previously designated and erected by law. He would not leave it with the President to give what he pleased to the soldiers, but whatever should be given should flow distinctly from the Legislature. In this he agreed with the Speaker. The sum of $10,000 had been asked for a sufficient extra pay for all the objects mentioned; but now it was proposed to give this sum for roads alone, and leave the other objects without any. Mr. P. said, he would rather reverse the proposition, and should probably move such an amendment. He concluded by protesting against the surrender of so important a power to the Executive—a power, which, if it vested anywhere, belonged to this House, and which he wished to retain.

Mr. STORRS said, that he was absent from his seat, at the last session, when the question of internal improvement was discussed. Having been one of the committee who reported to the House the resolution which gave rise to that discussion, his opinion was well known. It was not his intention, however, now to enter into any particular examination of the general question in relation to the powers of Congress on that point, as the subject now under consideration did not, in his judgment, necessarily involve that question. The effect of adopting the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was merely to render that specific which, last year, was included in a general appropriation for the Quartermaster's department. The Committee of Ways and Means, of which the honorable gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN) was a member, then reported to the House a general appropriation similar to this. No objection was made, on the passage of that bill, to the item, although perhaps it might have escaped his observation in the mass of estimates on which it was founded. Mr. S. entertained no doubt of the power of the President to employ the Army in the construction of roads, in time of peace as well as in war. He could never assent to the doctrine, that in time of war the President was clothed with any new or extraordinary powers over private property or the jurisdiction of the States. A declaration of war conferred on him no authority whatever, except to execute it, like any other statute. The Constitution had defined his powers: to that only could he look for his authority. The Congress, by changing the state of our relations with a foreign Power, can confer nothing on the Executive which the Constitution has not granted. The doctrine in itself was fraught with dangerous consequences, and he protested against it as subversive of those salutary limits which were provided against the exercise of unlimited power. The question before the House is, whether the Congress shall prescribe the gross amount of the pay of the Army, or leave the appropriation to the distribution of the Executive, as has heretofore been done; whether he shall be suffered to determine the disposition of so much of this general appropriation as the amendment includes, and at his pleasure thus indirectly to fix the amount of the pay of the Army. It is otherwise, in substance, to authorize him to put his hand into the public Treasury and disburse the favor of the Government, unrestrained by any limits affixed by Congress. By passing the amendment, this limit would be definitively fixed. He had other objections to the expenditure of a general appropriation in this way by the President. The remark of the honorable Speaker, in the Committee of the Whole, had great force with him. It taught the Army to look to the President, and not to the House of Representatives, for support. Mr. S. said, that the tendency of this to alienate the affections of the Army from the House, and to confer them elsewhere, would lead to evils which it was now peculiarly proper to guard against. So long as, under the Constitution, this House was the only legitimate source of appropriation, it ought to be known that the dispensing of the public funds was at its disposition alone; that they should prescribe the amount, as far as practicable, which should be applied distinctly to every object; that they should determine the subjects of their favors and the extent of their rewards. This course ought not to offend those who approve of the exercise of the powers of the President in the construction of military roads. The adoption of the amendment is a sanction of the course he has hitherto pursued, and the appropriation is professedly in aid of those laudable efforts which he is now making to put the nation in a state of complete defence. There is nothing, therefore, in this course, on the part of the House, which indicates hostility to his views, or which should alarm his friends. It is rather an approval of his conduct in this respect, and as such he should be willing it should be construed. He hoped, for these reasons, that the House would concur in the amendment.

Mr. MERCER said, that Mr. PITKIN's arguments furnished a full reply to all his exceptions. He denied that any road made by the Roman people was a military road. He had heard of the Ap-pian way, and other public highways of that gallant nation, but never of any military road. They might have been called so, as some of those in France were, because constructed by the army, to distinguish them from any others not made by the army. Mr. M. did not think the appropriation was improper as regarded the kind of roads to be made; it was not correct either that, in all past time, the appropriation for barracks, &c., pointed out where those were to be constructed; nor in all cases of fortification, because these, he argued, were something of a temporary nature, which could not be designated—barracks which surrounded troops, or a simple mound of earth, were properly fortifications. Mr. M. did not believe the War Department had committed any violation of the Constitution in the duties which it had prescribed to the Quartermaster, in constructing barracks, in repairing roads, encampments, &c., and how were these duties to be compensated if not by some appropriation? Mr. M. expressed great confidence in the capacity of the Secretary of War; although young in the duties of his office, he had discharged them with great ability; and he had done nothing in the subject under consideration which was not recognised and regulated by law. In exercising, however, the spirit of criticism on this or any other subject, Mr. M. did not mean to array himself in opposition to the Government; parties, he said, were broken up—were gone. Mr. M. proceeded to argue that the sum asked for by the Secretary of War for this purpose, so far from being extravagant, was, in his opinion, not enough—it ought to have been more. The public force ought to be kept constantly employed. In the mode of constructing fortifications, also, Mr. M. doubted the expediency of erecting them by contract, and adduced some examples to show that the former system was preferable in economy and faithfulness of execution. The order respecting the cultivation of vegetables, &c., for the use of the Army in garrison, Mr. M. highly approved. Returning to the immediate question, Mr. M. said, the object of the appropriation was perfectly legitimate; there was no army in the world which was not occasionally employed in making roads for their passage through the country. Was it proper to call out the people of a Territory to make roads where necessary for the passage of the troops? Some feeling had been excited, he said—something like triumph that the Executive had been acting improperly. He wanted no share of this triumph. He hoped the Executive would continue so to use the public force. Mr. M. added some further remarks illustrating the opinions he had now and before expressed on the subject; and, for reasons he had previously offered, wishing further time for a decision on this bill, he concluded by moving to lay it on the table.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. MILLS did not think that Mr. PITKIN's arguments had been answered. His chief argument was, that if this power resides in the General Government at all, it does not reside in the Executive alone. He asked if it was contended that the Army could be employed in making a road from post to post, where there was none? If not, where was the difficulty of meeting the views submitted by Mr. PITKIN? If the power was given to the President to make a road where he pleased, through a Territory or elsewhere, look, Mr. M. said, to the consequences of a difference of opinion on the subject between the Executive and the Legislature. Suppose the Legislature should deem it necessary to prepare for war with a foreign Power, Great Britain for instance, and that all their preparations should be directed to that point; then, suppose the Executive should be of a different opinion, and think such a course unwise. Having the power of designating where these public works are proper, and using the public force for them, he might take a very different point, and go in a direction towards a different nation, and thus defeat the object of the Legislature. This idea Mr. M. illustrated in various ways, and adduced several arguments against the propriety of stripping the Legislature of this important power, and conferring it on the Executive. It was giving him powers as Commander-in-Chief of the Army which he did not rightfully possess. Mr. M. in reply to Mr. STORRS, denied that the Commander-in-Chief had the same powers in peace as he had in war, and enumerated many acts that, in one state of affairs, would be legitimate, and in the other, would be highly improper and injurious. In war he might destroy private property, or even blow up a town, in carrying on hostilities against the enemy, but these and many other acts would not be tolerated in time of peace. It had been urged that this appropriation would test the opinion of the President, as to the power of constructing roads, &c. Whether, Mr. M. said, he wished to come in conflict with the President or not, on the question of internal improvements, he did not think it proper here, or that it would at all decide the great question whether the General Government have the power to construct roads and canals; and Mr. M. argued that a vote on this question would not commit any member on the other. The President himself, in his Message, had denied the general power, yet had he considered himself authorized to use the public funds in making particular roads by the Army. The vote, therefore, on inserting a small item in a military appropriation bill, could not be considered conclusive on the broad question.

Mr. LOWNDES submitted a few more remarks explanatory of the practice in reporting appropriation bills; and then observed that he thought Mr. PITKIN's principal objections had been answered by Mr. MERCER. He thought there was no inconsistency in denying the general power of constructing internal improvements, and yet voting an appropriation for making any little road where there should be a temporary encampment, &c. There was, Mr. L. conceived, no inconsistency between the expressed opinion of the Executive respecting the general power, and the conduct of the Executive on this subject. The propriety of making specific appropriations for all objects, where it could well be done, he did not deny; but he was also apprehensive that it might be pushed to an improper extent. All appropriations could not be specific; but, after making them as minute as possible, and limiting the Executive to a certain extent, there would be always some discretion left him. It was proper, also, Mr. L. admitted, where it could be done, to designate and fix the place where the public money is to be applied; but this could not in all cases be done, and he mentioned instances in which this was left by law to the discretion of the Executive; and the present was one of those cases in which this must necessarily be done. Mr. L. concluded by admitting the necessity of strict vigilance in this branch of the Government towards the Executive; but the principle, as advocated by Mr. PITKIN, he thought, had the appearance of unreasonable jealousy, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, replied to Mr. PITKIN at some length, principally in explanation and justification of the course pursued by the Committee of Ways and Means, and to establish the opinion that the President had the power legally to construct military roads, inasmuch as the regulations on the subject had been recognised by law.

Mr. PITKIN spoke briefly in reply to the gentlemen who had controverted his arguments.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, made a few remarks to remove any imputation of inconsistency between the vote in favor of this appropriation, and the vote at the last session, on the general powers of the Government to make internal improvements. Ninety members had decided that the General Government had a right to apply the revenue to the purposes of internal improvement, upon the principle that, where you have revenue, you have a right to use it for the general benefit. The power of constructing military roads was equally indubitable: but it was a power in the exercise of which Congress ought to have a voice, and this appropriation placed it on its proper footing.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose for the purpose of referring the House to the vote of the last session, on the several resolutions reported by the Committee on Internal Improvement, and to apply the principle sustained on that occasion to the amendment under consideration. The only resolution touching this subject, which received the sanction of a majority of the House, at that time, is in the following words: "Resolved, That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other roads, and for the improvement of water courses." In giving an affirmative vote on this proposition, he was not governed by the opinion that the power to construct these improvements within the limits of an independent State of the Union, resided in the National Legislature. The power to appropriate money to any object which may be deemed important to the general welfare, is, and must of necessity, remain purely discretionary. Neither the convention who formed the Constitution, nor any other body of men, could possess sufficient forecast to enumerate all the cases to which it would be proper and necessary, from time to time, to appropriate the revenues of the nation. The only safeguard placed around the Treasury is, that no money shall be drawn from it without the authority of law; and the concurrence of both Houses of Congress, and the President, in the propriety of a public expenditure, is a sufficient guarantee against an abuse of this discretion; for the prudent exercise of which they are responsible to their constituents. It was on this ground that he had given his assent to the Constitutional power of Congress to "construct post roads and military roads: provided that private property be not taken for public use, without just compensation." This resolution was negatived, as also that which relates to military canals, and roads necessary for commerce between the States. It is now proposed to vest the President alone with unlimited authority to construct military roads, without regard to State rights, or security of private property! A power which this House has solemnly decided, after much investigation, is not given by the Constitution to Congress. It will, if the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Kentucky prevails, be vested in the Executive, who is only a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature.

Sir, it has been asserted in the course of this discussion, that the present Chief Magistrate has assumed and exercised the power to construct and open military roads, notwithstanding the Constitutional objections communicated by him to the House, at the opening of the last session of Congress. This declaration is totally unsupported by any fact, to which reference has been had. With regard to the labor performed by the troops, in the neighborhood of Plattsburg and Sackett's Harbour, it was bestowed on a public highway, long since constructed and opened, under State authority. The fatigue duty done by it by the soldiers, was in obedience to a general law on that subject, and for the accommodation of the Army. No right was claimed or exercised, to construct the road, or alter its location, in any respect whatever. The other cases mentioned, are the roads leading from Georgia to St. Stephen, in the Alabama Territory, and from Columbia, in Tennessee, to Lake Ponchartrain: and those have been authorized by several acts of Congress, making appropriations for their completion. Mr. P. contended that there was not the smallest foundation for the charge which had been made against the President, of a usurpation of power, deemed by him to be constitutionally vested in the legislative department of Government. He considered the proposed appropriation, although small in amount, as involving a very important principle, the establishment of which might lead to very dangerous consequences: and he therefore expressed a hope, that the House would disagree to the report of the Committee of the Whole, and leave the question to be decided on a distinct proposition.

TUCKER, explanatory of the votes of last session, &c. a motion prevailed to lay the bill on the table. And the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, January 11.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill, authorizing the subscription of stock in the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole, tomorrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a letter from William Lambert, accompanied with two hundred copies of Abstracts of Calculations, to ascertain the longitude of the Capitol in the City of Washington, from Greenwich Observatory, in England; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Moss," was read the third time and passed.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill to make appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for 1819, and the amendment thereto reported by the Committee of the Whole, for making a distinct appropriation of $10,000 for extra pay to non-commissioned officers and soldiers employed in the construction and repairs of military roads, was immediately under consideration.

Mr. LINCOLN, of Massachusetts, said, that the darkness by which the subject under consideration was overshadowed, seemed to him to result from the want of a correct definition of the term "military roads." It is important, said he, to have one. Without it we cannot ascertain to what specific use the appropriation in the amendment of the bill may be applied, or whether it is or is not proper to make it.

An honorable gentleman from Virginia has informed us that a road becomes "military" by being constructed by military men. It is difficult to conceive how the nature of the object is affected by the capacity of the agent who acts upon it. If a work becomes military as resulting from the military power which produces it, then, had this Hall been erected by a corps of the artificers of the Army, it would have been a military work, the honorable Speaker the commandant of a fortress, and the maxim, now so apropos, "cedant arma togæ, cedant laurea linguæ," would cease to apply. How happens it, if the definition given is correct, that the Roman roads, which extended from the heart to the extremities of the empire, were not designated by the title of "military roads," although many of them were constructed by the imperial legions, although they were those by which the armies marched to the distant provinces, and through which the barbarians of the North passed to the gates of Rome, and made the queen of nations subsidiary to savages and the victim of robbers? That those roads were not so designated, we are informed by the gentle-

Others have avowed the opinion that all roads are alike, and one as appropriate to the use of an army as another. To assert that there is no difference between a road constructed, if you please, by a military corps, applied only to the facilitating the transport of munitions of war, the passing of troops, and subserving their wants and necessities, and a road used only for the interchange of trade and the social concerns of the community in time of peace, is to advance a proposition, to the truth of which my mind refuses its assent; it is to deny the word "military," used to express the quality of the object with which it agrees, any force or meaning.

That the right of constructing a military road exists in the President of the United States, in time of war, is admitted. It must be a right absolute and independent, or it would be inadequate to answer the occasion, the imperious urgency of which alone can justify its exercise. It cannot, therefore, be derived from the Constitution, as it would be in derogation of those rights reserved to the States, respectively; neither, if it exists in time of war only, as is alleged, can it be traced to that source; for the Constitution is not calculated for any particular meridian or point of time; it is not now active and the next moment a mere dead letter, but is in force at all times, immutable, and, like truth, eternal.

Whence, then, is the right in the President to construct military roads derived? From the paramount law of human nature, the law of self-preservation; a law which justifies acts not only not authorized by the Constitution, but directly contravening its provisions. It exists as well in peace as in war, and would authorize the President to blow up the dwelling of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who adverted to that incident, as fully at the present moment as amidst the rage of battle, did the "common defence" and "general welfare" now require the sacrifice. It is a right not belonging peculiarly to him, but is common to all, and gives to the humblest subaltern the same privileges as to the commander-in-chief.

Having described the source and character of the power to be employed, let us endeavor to ascertain the nature of the effect produced. That the right of way through a country, to defend which is the object of the existence of an army, belongs to that army, cannot be denied without asserting that it must be considered as a motionless and inert mass. Having the right of way, it has also, as incident to it, that of furnishing to itself a military road as the means of executing it. This right results from the supreme law of necessity, and, of consequence, ceases when the exigency which required its exercise has passed away. The sovereignty of the local authority, and the ownership of the individual proprietor of the soil, for a time dormant, immediately revive.

To consider the right to be permanent, is to give the commander of an army the power to acquire territory at pleasure, and to constitute a military despotism, in principle as great, and in its exercise as fatal, as that of the Praetorian guards of Rome or the Janissaries of Turkey. It gives to the President a power in the highest degree dangerous. As the people have delegated to us only that portion of power which it was necessary for them to part with for the purposes of social order and civil society, so ought we not to sanction, in the other departments of the Government, the exercise of any more than is indispensably requisite for those purposes; for, if you grant power you will in vain legislate against its abuse; if you furnish temptations to avarice and ambition, they will pursue their objects to the heights of danger and the depths of perdition. In the present case, by authorizing the President to construct permanent military roads at his discretion, you put into his hand the means of corruption, the bribe by which he may seduce the States into a subserviency to his views, to enable him to establish himself as a first consul, a perpetual dictator, and a tyrant. Even should his favors not be accepted as the wages of corruption, is it not inconsistent with human nature that one, who perceives the eye of kindness beaming upon him, and benefactions showered upon his head by some superior being, should be able to suppress the emotions of gratitude and the disposition to be devoted to the interests of his benefactor?

The claim of authority, thus sanctioned, is also throwing the apple of discord among the States. Each member of our political family will consider its necessities and its rights equal. When one shall perceive that favors, in which it does not participate, are bestowed upon another, the harmony of the Union will be disturbed by jealousies, which, combining with other elements of discontent, may terminate in storms which may sweep the country with fatal fury.

Under the belief that exigencies may happen, which may require an expenditure of public money upon military roads such as I have described, I shall vote for the contemplated appropriation; but I protest against any of it being applied to defraying the expense of roads like that from Plattsburg to the St. Lawrence, which I do not consider to be any more a military road than this House is a barrack. I do not say this, however, out of disrespect to the President, by whose orders it was constructed; for, as on the one hand I am not disposed to join in the anthem, glory to the President in the highest, which will always be chanted by a full choir, on the other I hope I shall not be wanting in that respect, confidence, affection, and esteem, which belongs to the man who has devoted his life to the service of his country, and been one of its ablest statesmen and brightest ornaments; so long as he shall continue to be actuated by those patriotic feelings which I believe now to influence him, and those enlightened views which have for the most part characterized his Administration.

Mr. L. concluded by making some remarks to prove that the allowance of extra pay to soldiers on fatigue duty is sanctioned by law.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words in italic, and inserting the words "working on" in lieu thereof. He explained the object of his amendment, by a number of observations, the substance of which was, that he did not believe it was ever intended that the President of the United States, in the exercise of powers granted to him by the Constitution, should be authorized to enter upon the property of individuals for the purpose of making roads, except where, in time of war, it became necessary to facilitate the movements of the Army. That the Government had a right of way for certain purposes over the property of individuals, he had no doubt; and that the best appropriation of the labor of soldiers, in time of peace, was to employ them in making or repairing roads, was agreed on all hands. He did not wish that the Executive should have unlimited authority in the allowance of extra pay for such services; at the same time he could see no objection to giving the authority to the Executive to employ the spare labor of the Army in making roads not interfering with individual right, &c.

Mr. M'DALL, of Virginia, opposed the motion to amend the appropriation clause. [The clause reported by the Committee of the Whole made an appropriation of $10,000 for the construction and repair of military roads, but the proposed amendment was a substitute, omitting the word military, and consequently looking to a discretion in the Executive to apply the money to roads other than military.] Mr. P. expressed the reluctance with which he must oppose any modification suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, as he was sensible that gentleman was and would continue to be a decided friend to the faculty of this Government for internal improvement, and even at that moment, Mr. P. said, he found himself pursuing the same object with the honorable mover of the amendment, for both wished the bill to assume a form which would unite the votes of all who affirmed the power of the General Government to construct roads and canals. It was indeed difficult to present the great question of internal improvement in a shape which would unite its friends. When particular objects of improvement are designated and proposed, many honorable members, who expressly declare that the Government has power to construct roads, will, however, vote against the measure, on the ground of the inexpediency of appropriating money to those particular objects. But when resolutions are proposed merely declaring in general terms that Congress has the power to make roads, other gentlemen who admit the truth of the declaration, vote against the resolutions, alleging the impropriety of legislating on what are called abstract propositions. Again, other gentlemen who conscientiously believe that the assent of the State governments was essential to the exercise of these powers of Congress, found themselves constrained to negative resolutions comprehending no salvo in relation to that topic. Thus it was that some awkward circumstance continually intervened to baffle every attempt to consolidate the strength of the majority in the House. He was convinced there was no risk of error in declaring that, whenever our good fortune should enable us to devise a measure, the expediency of which would be admitted by those who believed in the Constitutional power, it would be found that at least two thirds of the House were the friends of internal improvement, on which event the Presidential opposition would of necessity yield to the power of Congress.

Some gentlemen, the decided advocates of internal improvement, were now heard to object to the appropriation for military roads, because it was a mere appropriation, or setting aside a sum of money for a particular object, and asserted that, although Congress may make a law to authorize the President to open a road, no such law existed, and that no such authority could be implied from an appropriation bill, which only sought to make an arrangement to govern the accounts and moneys of the Treasury. Would not the objections of these gentlemen be strengthened instead of being dissipated by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio? For if they affirmed that the President could make or repair no military road without an act of Congress, (exclusive of the appropriation bill,) they would of course be more hostile to the gentleman's amendment, which was founded on the supposition of the President's power to make not only military, but all other roads; hence it was evident that the proposed amendment would, in repugnance to the wish of its author, only serve to perplex or divide the friends of internal improvement. Mr. P. had no doubt of the power of the President to construct or repair military roads, without the previous sanction of an act of Congress, which would have become necessary, not to authorize the construction of the road, but to warrant the Treasury Department to disburse the money necessary for that object. Nor did this assertion of Executive power militate in the least against the power possessed by Congress to construct roads. On the contrary, the Presidential power, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to construct military roads, might admit of control by Congress, which could restrain or embarrass the exercise of the President's power by the exertion of its own Constitutional rights, of censuring or impeaching for abuse of power; or, by withholding supplies, or even by its right to pass laws for the government of the Army and the departments. The President wanted no law to enable him to make military roads; he could only want money to enable him to exercise powers purely Executive, which resulted from the Constitution and existing institutions, and which would remain until abrogated by Congressional discretion. Mr. P. lamented when he heard members with whom he had the honor to vote on the question of internal improvement at the last session, give notice of their intention to vote for striking out the item for military roads. The ground they now assumed was untenable. He had observed that the gentlemen who had taken part in the present discussion had expressed their wish to avoid debate on the question of the power of the Government (Congress and the President) to construct roads; and yet the subjects were so connected that those who addressed the Chair found themselves in the incidental discussion of that great question. He would not discuss the topic so ably handled by others at the last session, except in reference to the relative powers of the President and Congress, in doing which he would address an argument exclusively to the friends of internal improvement, by reminding them of certain premises in which they all concurred at the last session, and showing that those premises, which conducted them all to the conclusion that the whole Government possessed power to construct roads, canals, &c., would now necessarily lead to the conclusion that the President without any new law had the power to construct and repair military roads.

Our friends, said he, had then insisted that the Government of the Union was vested, by the Constitution of the United States, with the control and direction of the armies and military force, with the power of removing that force from the interior to the frontier, and from one point to other places of destination on the frontier; that armies, military supplies, and munitions of war, could only pass or be removed by means of roads; which devolved on Government the necessity of opening roads when none were found, or of repairing such as were impassable. Mr. P. asked whether any gentleman denied to the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, the right (continually practised) of removing detachments of the military force, with its ordnance, &c., from one place or garrison to others on the western or southern frontier, even where no roads are found? If such right existed in the President, the power to construct or repair military roads, by the same officer, would result of necessity, as, without it, the admitted right and duty of the President could not be exercised. He believed this subject was frequently obscured by the indiscriminate use of the term power, that carried with it an idea not easily distinguishable from property or right, and which rendered it desirable, to any one in quest of truth, to dismiss this equivocal word, and review the subject (if possible) as ranked under no particular denomination, or express its relations by other terms. True, he said, the Constitution did not express that the President should have power to open military roads; but was it not equally true, that some powers, in relation to some subjects, were vested by that instrument in the President? If gentlemen would select any one of those legitimate powers, which it was both the right and duty of the President to carry into execution, and, at the same time, imagine the utter impossibility of executing the power without incurring expenditures of labor or money, they must agree that the President may incur such expenditure, although not found expressed in the list of Constitutional powers. When the mind had found this result, it would seem idle to dispute of terms. Let it be called the power, or the necessity, or exigency of the President or Army, no misconception of terms should enhance or detract from the faculties of the Executive. Although the faculty of constructing military roads was made to result from a principle of necessity, it would constitute no ground of objection to its existence, for the President alone could judge of the necessity; nor was danger to be apprehended from any abuse of the power whilst this House retained its integrity and vigor. The military detachments, so frequently marched in the western wilderness since the foundation of the Government, in almost every expedition found it necessary to have roads made by the expenditures of the labor and money of the nation; yet, gentlemen could furnish no instance of laws being required to authorize these roads; they were opened or repaired by the mere authority of the President or of his officers; Congress had no concern with them until after the expense was incurred, when called on for appropriations. Nor could any instance be shown of refusal to make those appropriations. It seemed that the expenses of repairing roads had been defrayed from the appropriation of the Quartermaster's department; and that this course was justifiable would be manifest from an examination of the law, as the Quartermaster General was, when thereto required by the Secretary of War, to procure and provide means of transport for the Army, its stores, artillery, and camp equipage. Yet, the method now proposed of appropriating a certain sum expressly for the construction and repair of military roads, was preferable to the former practice, as a detail of each item of expense conveyed more information, and was consequently more satisfactory to the public than a complication of particulars under a head not so easily understood by our constituents.

Gentleman had complained that the Executive, by color of the extra pay and ration afforded to the soldiers while on fatigue in repairing military roads, had undertaken to raise the wages of soldiers without a law to warrant the measure. This complaint was, however, easily vanquished, while the argument in support of the Executive power to repair roads remained unanswered; for the Executive might employ artificers and laborers, who did not belong to the army, to repair these roads. The ordinary pay insured to the soldier by the contract of enlistment does not purport to be a compensation for labor on roads with the mattock; he would receive the pay appertaining to his character as a soldier, although he performed no labor in the construction or repair of roads. As the Executive, therefore, saves the expense of employing other artificers and laborers, by availing itself of the (otherwise idle) time of the soldier, and as the soldier thereby performs a service not compensated for by his wages as a soldier, it would accord with law and justice to make him a proper remuneration.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH said, that he hoped the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BEECHER) would be rejected. He said that, should it be rejected, he would offer an amendment making an appropriation "for the extra pay of non-commissioned officers and soldiers employed in opening and repairing roads, and constructing and repairing bridges necessary for the movement of the army, or any detachment thereof." Such an appropriation was now proper; as the House had struck $10,000 out of the appropriation for the Quartermaster's department; that the appropriation thus made would be in conformity to existing laws; the regulations of the War Department containing a clause in these words, which regulations have been adopted by law. By this means, said Mr. S., we shall avoid passing any new law, and we shall make the bill what an appropriation bill ought to be—a simple grant of money for carrying into execution existing laws. To insert in this bill a clause involving a great Constitutional question, seemed to him not to be a correct course of legislation.

The allowance of extra pay, said Mr. S., to soldiers engaged in necessary labor, has long been sanctioned by usage, and for some years past has been sanctioned by law. The allegation that the President has given extra pay to the soldiers, without authority by law, whereby the attachment of the soldiers to Congress, to whom they ought to look for their pay, may be transferred to the President, is without foundation.

An honorable member (Mr. CLAY) who spoke some days since on this subject, seemed to suppose that the House and the President disagreed, and were at issue on the question respecting the power of Congress to make internal improvements. The honorable member was mistaken.

On referring to the Journal of the House at its last session, it will appear that there is a perfect and entire agreement in opinion between the President and the House.

At the last session, said Mr. S., a resolution was offered, declaring "that Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct roads and canals necessary for commerce between the States." It was rejected—ayes 46, noes 120. Another resolution was offered, declaring that "Congress has power under the Constitution to construct post roads and military roads." It was rejected—ayes 82, noes 84. Another resolution was offered declaring that "Congress has power under the Constitution to construct canals for military purposes." It was rejected—ayes 81, noes 83. The only resolution adopted by the House, declared, "That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other roads, and for the improvement of water courses."

The House has explicitly declared that Congress have not power to construct roads of any kind, but that it has power to make appropriations for such a purpose. The President has coincided with the House in both of those opinions. He has said, as this House have said, that Congress have not power to make internal improvements; while he has sanctioned appropriations of money made by Congress for such improvements.

The President's Message to Congress, at the last session, has been alluded to, and his communication of his opinion that Congress had not power to make internal improvements, has been spoken of with disapprobation. The House well know, said Mr. S., that it is the duty of the President, made so by the Constitution, "to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient."

The President's Message contained the following clause: "When we consider the vast extent of territory within the United States; the great amount and value of its productions; the connexion of its parts, and other circumstances on which their prosperity and happiness depend; we cannot fail to entertain a high sense of the advantage to be derived from the facility which may be afforded in the intercourse between them, by means of good roads and canals.—Never did a country of such vast extent offer equal inducements to improvements of this kind, nor ever were consequences of such magnitude involved in them." Does not this passage show the President to be a most ardent advocate for internal improvement? What language could he have used more conclusively proving his friendliness to a system of internal improvement? The President then expressed with candor his opinion that Congress do not possess the right to establish a system of internal improvement; and then recommends a measure to the consideration of Congress. That measure is, that they should recommend to the States the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution, granting to Congress the right to establish a system of internal improvement. He then says: "In cases of doubtful construction, especially of such vital interest, it comports with the nature and origin of our institutions, and will contribute much to preserve them, to apply to our constituents for an explicit grant of power."

I can find nothing, said Mr. S., in this Message, calculated to provoke this House to enter, as has been proposed, into hostilities with the President of the United States, concerning a system of internal improvement, or any other subject whatever. Yet an honorable member (Mr. CLAY) has proposed, that Congress shall pass the bill rejected by Mr. Madison, a bill deemed unconstitutional by the President, and which this House, by its vote of last session, has also explicitly declared to be unconstitutional. That this unconstitutional bill, so to be passed, shall be sent to the President, and if he will not approve of it, that then we shall withhold a part of the supplies which we deem necessary and proper for the public service, and enter into hostilities with the President upon this subject. Sir, said Mr. S., I would call the particular attention of the House to this proposition. Let the House place themselves in the situation of the President, and consider how they would feel should another branch of the Government adopt a similar course towards them.

Suppose, sir, that the Senate should send you a sedition bill, and you should reject it as being unconstitutional; suppose the Senate were then to lay your bills upon their table, and give you to understand that they would obstruct the wheels of Government until you passed the bill which you had declared to be unconstitutional. I ask in what terms you would speak of the Senate?

The President of the United States, in the presence of Heaven and of this nation, has sworn that he will preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. And it is proposed that, unless he will violate this solemn promise, by approving a bill which in his conscience he believes to be unconstitutional, that the House of Representatives shall withhold a part of the necessary supplies. Sir, I will say no more on this subject.

Some gentlemen seem to be of opinion that whatever the President or any officer of the Government has a right to do, Congress may do the same thing by law, and that as the President, Commander-in-Chief of the army, by the labor of soldiers may open roads, therefore Congress may by law make roads. But, this conclusion by no means follows the premises. The President is, by the Constitution, Commander-in-Chief of the army; but Congress cannot by law command the army. The President may appoint ambassadors, and make treaties; but Congress cannot by law appoint ambassadors and make treaties. You have a right to raise an army; the President has by the Constitution a right to command it; this army must move from place to place, and occupy camps and cantonments. The Quartermaster General is charged to provide for those marches and encampments. Every one has a right to the means of performing his duties. Consequently the Quartermaster General may open and repair roads for the march of the army. But this furnishes no pretence for the claim on the part of Congress to make roads by law.

Those who have formerly contended for the self-evident propositions that the President might by the labor of the army make the road necessary for its movement, have been denominated "friends of Executive power." But none of them contended that permanent roads could be made and protected by the President. A right to make temporary roads, to facilitate its movements and its supplies, is all that was contended for on the part of the army.

By way of recommending permanent military roads, to be constructed by the army under the orders of the President, we are told by an honorable member (Mr. S. SMITH) whose opinions I respect, of the great advantages of such roads in time of war. I admit, that, to an ambitious conquering nation, military roads offer facilities in the invasion of their neighbors; but, to a peaceful nation, which wages only defensive war, they are pernicious. The Romans in their prosperity, while they were conquerors, constructed permanent military roads; and on those roads, in the decline of the Roman Empire, the Suevi, the Goths, and the Allemanni, marched to invade Rome. France in her prosperity, while engaged under the great Napoleon in the conquest of the neighboring nations, made military roads; and on those roads the Russians and Austrians marched to the conquest of France. For what purpose do we require military roads? To make war against the Seminoles, or the Chippewas? I presume not. Or, is it to make war against Spain? Are we to make a military road to Mexico? I presume not. I do not know of any direction in which a military road can be wanting, except towards Canada; and I do not perceive the expediency of making demonstrations towards the conquest of Canada at this time. Sir, said Mr. S., should Great Britain at any time hereafter force us into a war, I would advise that the first step to be taken for the conquest of Canada shall be the passage of an act of Congress declaring, that the Canadas shall be admitted into the Union so soon as they shall have formed Republican constitutions. Should that measure be adopted, Canada will be conquered without a military road. The Government never seriously resolved on the conquest of Canada during the late war. That intention has been disavowed.

Sir, the amendment proposed by the Committee of the Whole, seems to me to mean something more than meets the eye. I apprehend it is a plan to commence a general system of internal improvement, by the means of soldiers. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Internal Improvement, (Mr. TUCKER,) my esteemed colleague and friend, has said that, provided he can have internal improvement, he is not particularly solicitous by what means it is obtained. I cannot agree with him. I deem it of great importance by what means this internal improvement shall be effected. The system, to be equal, must be general; it must pervade every part of the country; and I confess that I should greatly regret to see any part of the country filled with soldiers, engaged in making roads.

The first effect of such a system would be, to disgrace your army, by transforming the soldiers into laboring slaves, and the officers into overseers, armed with whips. While the army is employed in making roads necessary for its own movement, or in providing itself with necessities, it will feel no degradation; but set them to work in making highways for the use of the farmers and the planters, and they will soon feel themselves dishonored. Then, indeed, you may dismiss from your service General Jackson, and every other gallant officer.

The second effect of such a system would be, to endanger the liberties of the people. Your little army of five thousand men will prove inadequate to the task of effecting a system of general internal improvement; the number must be greatly increased. The people, seeing the soldiers employed in making roads and canals, and finding great convenience and advantage from such works, the aversion to a standing army will be abated. You may presently have fifty thousand of those military laborers, who, finding themselves without liberty and without honor, will be fit instruments to effect the designs of ambition.

Military Appropriation Bill.

JANUARY, 1819.

Suppose that only ten thousand such men had been employed in Maryland and Virginia, in making roads at the time of the contest whether Mr. Jefferson or Burr should be President, I ask you what would have been the consequence?

Let us adopt no measure, the effect of which must be to embarrass the President of the United States. Let us preserve the harmony of the different branches of the Government. And if we are to have a system of internal improvement executed under the authority of the United States, whether by powers already vested in the Government, or to be obtained by an amendment of the Constitution, let the system be carried into execution, not by military, but by civil power.

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, said, that he had listened to the debate of the last session in relation to the several resolutions on the subject of internal improvements with the utmost attention, and that he, at the time, regretted to have been prevented by circumstances from expressing his sentiments on questions so interesting to the community. He had regretted it the more, because he differed considerably, on most of those questions, from those who admitted the Constitutional powers of Congress to make internal improvements generally, as well as from those who denied the existence of such powers altogether. He would, therefore, by leave of the Chair, advert to the interpretation of the Constitution which appeared to him to be the most natural and reasonable; and whatever powers were intended to be conferred on Congress he would be very far from narrowing by construction, while he was equally adverse to that "liberality" which, in a general expression, liable perhaps to ambiguity, could discern the delegation of almost unlimited powers.

In the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution, it is made the duty of Congress "to provide for the common defence." This power is clearly intended to be exercised, not only in time of war, but, from the very import of the word provide, is also intended to include prospective preparation in time of peace. It is therefore the duty of Congress, even when the nation is in profound quiet, to erect armories, arsenals, and forts, and to establish and fortify all such points, on our seacoast and frontier, as are most exposed to an enemy, or most advantageous to repel invasion. This power, said Mr. F., has never been questioned, and has been uniformly exercised; and the necessity of marching troops, and transporting provisions and munitions of war from the populous parts of the country, where alone they can be obtained, requires also the construction of suitable roads. Wherever these roads have already been constructed by the States or other local authorities, Congress can have no occasion to provide them; but on our extended frontier, in the North, West, and South, the case is far different. The mere purposes of civil intercourse will not probably, for half a century, induce or enable the scattered population of those vast tracts of country to make such roads, or other means of communication, as are indispensable in the mere preparation for a common defence. Yet a war with Great Britain, Spain, or the western tribes of Indians, instantly exposes our frontier in some or all of those points; and it would be a most unworthy dereliction of their duty, if Congress should neglect the obvious and early means of waging such wars successfully. Such wars are inevitable, and the country has, at this moment, its eyes upon us, approving the application of the revenue to extensive and substantial military defence. When war impends, or is actually raging, it will be vain to begin to provide against it; the revenues are speedily engrossed by more immediate objects, or reduced by the derangement of commerce, and the checks to national industry. "In peace provide for war," is the dictate of common prudence—it is also the dictate of our Constitution.

The construction of post roads, though not of superior or of equal necessity, is, perhaps, more clearly given by a subsequent clause of the same article of the Constitution; wherever they do not already exist, and the public convenience shall require the establishment of a regular, certain, and frequent intelligence, such roads may be constructed by the National Legislature.

But the sovereignty and exclusive jurisdiction of the States is considered by some gentlemen as an insuperable obstacle to the construction of roads by Congress, while they assent to the right to appropriate the public revenues for that purpose. Hence the first resolution, at the last session, declaring the right to appropriate for the construction of "military and other roads," passed by a considerable majority; while the second, asserting the right to construct "military," not including "other" roads, was negatived. Mr. F. said, if it is the right and duty of Congress to "provide" roads, whether in peace or war, then the States have no right to interpose in its exercise, any more than to arrest the march of national troops, or the collection of revenue, or any other usual and well recognised exercise of Constitutional power. In all these particulars the States, by agreeing to the National compact, conceded so much of their original sovereignty as the "common defence and general welfare" required to be intrusted to the National Government. If the first resolution, therefore, was established, the second was still clearer, for the mere right to appropriate money, without the right to secure the object, is preposterous and nugatory. Do gentlemen believe that the States, into whose treasuries it is presumed the money appropriated is intended to be paid, will be disposed to listen to the wishes or request of the National Government, and, very obligingly, make the roads, which may be thus humbly submitted to their discretion? Gentlemen need not travel back so far as to the records of Congress, and of the States, before the existence of the present Constitution, to learn whether the individual sovereign States will comply with the recommendation of Congress; or whether local and other considerations will not often lead to measures quite different. Surely, then, the appropriation of money for military defence must include the power to complete that defence in all its parts, and the construction of military roads is not the least considerable.

Military Appropriation Bill.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN) has remarked, that a military road is an unintelligible phrase; that it is impossible to distinguish a military road from any other; from which he probably infers that, if Congress may construct military roads, they may also construct others of a different description. I cannot see the difficulty of discrimination, said Mr. F., in the same light with that gentleman. A military road appears to me as distinct and definite in its character as any expression whatever. The purpose for which a road is made, and its adaptation to the object, being entirely military, the epithet is properly attached to it; and its correctness is not diminished because the road may be conducive to civil and commercial intercourse. The Constitutional object of making such roads must be national preservation; but it must, indeed, be gratifying to consider how much the interests and social enjoyments of our fellow-citizens may be improved by thus facilitating their intercourse with each other.

There can be no doubt that, in time of peace, it is of great consequence to preserve in the army a system of discipline and temperate habits, which are indispensable to health and vigor. We are told, by military gentlemen, that the established usage in all armies exempts the soldiery from labor on roads and other public works, and that such employment is not even stipulated in the contract of enlistment. Perhaps it might be good policy to enjoin on recruiting officers to make such a stipulation in future; but in the present case we must provide for the existing state of things. The trifling gratuity of fifteen cents per diem, in addition to the wages, is sufficient, it appears, from the experience of past years, to induce the soldier willingly to engage in such labors. The labor thus obtained costs less than one-fifth the sum for which it could be purchased by any other means. The army is thus occupied usefully to the public, and the health and vigor of the soldier is rescued from being a prey to idleness and vice.

The gentleman from Virginia near me, (Mr. SMYTH,) thinks the occupation of the army, in opening and improving roads, is degrading, and likely to debase its spirit and character. Sir, in what pursuits have our soldiers been engaged previous to their enlistment, more worthy or dignified than in husbandry? In what more honorable pursuits can they now engage? Such employment, sir, will elevate, not degrade, their character. The hoe and the spade are merely transferred from the tillage of the earth to the improvement of its surface in the adjacent roads. The same gentleman, too, apprehends that, when the people have felt the benefit of the roads thus acquired, they will become reconciled to standing armies; and that we shall soon augment their number so much, for the sake of the public works, that they may endanger our liberties. If the argument requires an answer, I will merely remind the gentleman of the unconquerable aversion to a standing army, which is so universal, that at this moment a proposition is before the House to reduce the little remnant still retained of those who lately fought our battles. Nor am I, said Mr. F., by any means prepared to pledge myself against its reduction, though I am not aware of any point where a reduction can take place without injury to the service, however desirous gentlemen may be to reduce the public expenditure. No, sir, a standing army can never be popular in any country; its increase will be watched in ours with jealousy, and the benefit of its labors on military roads, on our frontier, must always be limited to small portions of our countrymen, whose voice can never drown that of the whole community.

The objection, that too much is left to the discretion of the Executive in locating the roads has been well obviated by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEDES.) Whenever Congress may think proper to interfere, and to designate an important road, overlooked by the Executive, they can do so; or, when dissatisfied with roads designated by the Executive, the appropriation can be discontinued. Although, sir, I should have voted for the appropriation as it stood in the original bill, I am better satisfied with the amendment; not only because it designates clearly the amount and the purposes for which the money is to be expended, but also because the act of 1816, on the application of which to the regulations of the army it is stated that the expenditure has hitherto been made, is, to my mind at least, less unequivocal than could be wished.

Before closing my remarks, I cannot forbear asking the attention of gentlemen, who deny the power of Congress to construct any roads whatever, or to appropriate money for the purpose, to a prominent object of the proposed expenditure, the discipline and health of the army. Can the same object be attained in any less exceptionable manner? The tillage of gardens or other public lands in the vicinity of their several stations would be quite insufficient. The practice, in some countries, of employing the soldiery in labor for the neighboring cultivators, would be difficult, and perhaps endanger desertion. The improvement and construction of military roads is liable to none of these objections, and is therefore to be preferred, even for the well-being of the army. Is it not, then, consistent with the principles of these gentlemen to make the appropriation as the best and most economical system of preserving the army from the wasting effects of idleness, intemperance, and vice?

I hope, sir, the friends of the proposed amendment will find themselves supported by those who at first may have doubted, and that so salutary a measure may be found compatible with the principles of those who, on the general question, have held opinions quite opposite.

Mr. H. NELSON, of Virginia, next took the floor. In rising, he stated that he did not mean long to trespass on the time of the House on this occasion. But the vigilance of his honorable colleague having so presented it as to afford an opportunity of discussing the subject, he asked permission to lay before the House a few remarks on it.

He did not mean, he said, to vote for the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, nor for the original proposition of the Committee of the Whole House. A strong argument against these propositions was derivable from the embarrassment in which the subject was placed: the floodgates of discussion were broken up, and the question which had agitated the House, and he might say the nation, at the last session, was brought into discussion on this paltry appropriation of ten thousand dollars, and the House was called upon to decide upon the constitutional powers of the House and the President of the United States. Mr. N. said he had no objection, if it became necessary, to decide on the constitutional powers of this House, if a case should be presented, and should be within the legitimate scope of inquiry. But he did object to this manner of throwing upon the President of the United States, prematurely and indirectly, a question involving his constitutional powers. It might be said that he objected, on this occasion, to a specification of the appropriations in the bill. But, Mr. N. said, he did not. Where they could be made, according to the established usage of the country, and in the exercise of the power of the Government to guard the Treasury, it was proper to make specific appropriations. As far, however, as he understood the usage of the country, it had never been the practice of the Government to make appropriations, except for objects defined by law. The combination of the two acts, legislation and appropriation, in the same bill, was a novel usage, and one which he hoped the House would not countenance. When a general appropriation embraced several known objects, no inconvenience resulted from the practice, nor any necessity for specification. He trusted this would be considered the case with regard to the appropriation for the Quartermaster General's department in the present bill, and that the ten thousand dollars, proposed to be excepted, would be permitted to remain within it. Pursuing the figure used by the Speaker, said Mr. N., we have hunted with success, and, having run down the game, I hope it may be permitted to retire to its covert. If we are so vigilant as to strain at this small item, what becomes of the watchfulness of the guardians of the public purse in regard to the remaining five hundred and forty thousand dollars for the same department, without a single specification of its objects? We have swallowed this bolus, said he, and now we strain at a gnat. He did not mean to censure the House for thus voting the appropriation in gross for the Quartermaster General's department; because he presumed every gentleman had had an opportunity of examining the estimates, and satisfying himself of the propriety of the appropriation. But he did consider it extraordinary that, after swallowing the larger items, this draught should nauseate. It was not, he said, the magnitude of this appropriation, nor the importance of any principle involved, that was at the bottom of this debate. It surely could not be to save ten thousand dollars, nor yet to make that specific which was already as much so as the remaining five hundred and forty thousand dollars of that item of expenditure. No, sir, said Mr. N.; it has been avowed that the object is to restrain the President in the exercise of a power as Executive Magistrate which he has denied to exist in the Congress of the United States, of which he forms a part. Where was the evidence that any such power had been exercised? The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TUCKER) had said that a paragraph he had seen in a newspaper announced that thirteen miles of the road had been finished. If the gentleman was disposed to rely on newspaper authority for facts, as to the President, Mr. N. said he could have recommended him to a certain editor of a paper in Philadelphia, whose declarations, if viewed as evidence, would prove the President to have been anything but an honest man. Such authority, however, had no weight with him, and ought to have none with the House.

Mr. N. said he had no disposition to unite with gentlemen in throwing the responsibility of this decision respecting the question of internal improvement on the President of the United States. To do that, the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee of Internal Improvement would afford a fair opportunity; and he was not, therefore, disposed, in the incidental manner proposed, to say to the President, if you do not pass this bill with the enormous weight of the question of internal improvement upon it, you shall have no appropriation whatever for the support of the Army. Mr. N. said he wished to excite no unpleasant feelings, but he wished to rouse the attention of the majority of this House, who had decided, at the last session, that neither Congress nor the President had the power to make roads. He wished to persuade the House to examine this subject, and not indirectly to reverse that which at the last session they had pledged themselves to support. It was enough to say that it had been formally decided, by a majority of voices in this House, that no power does belong to Congress or to the Executive to construct roads and canals. On this question he was ready again to meet gentlemen, but he begged that he might not be challenged to meet them on this arena—it is too narrow, said he; let us have a fair field, such as the bill reported by the Committee on Internal Improvement.

Without intending to countenance the doctrine of Executive influence, Mr. N. asked whether it was liberal or candid towards the Chief Magistrate to embarrass him by presenting to him this question. The President had said, and the House had said with him, that Congress had not the power to make roads or canals; and it was now attempted, by the amendment of this bill, to present to him the dilemma of approving the bill and sanctioning the principle, or of stopping the whole appropriation bill. For what object? To arrest the operations of the Army, and disband or dissolve it? If that is the object, said Mr. N., let it be done openly. Or, if the President has assumed improper powers, meet him manfully, and stop him in his career. The sum involved in this question being so small as to be no object, we are to presume that some other object is in view, and that is, as avowed, to check the Executive. What was the power which he had ever used to which exception was taken? If proper information was before the House, he believed gentlemen would be satisfied there had been no abuse of power in the cases referred to. For, although, said Mr. N., I deny most positively, and with all my strength, that the Government can make roads, commercial, agricultural, or of any other description, yet I have no doubt that, on an existing road, leading from one garrison to another, Congress may appropriate money to make those roads practicable for the transportation of munitions of war, and that the Executive may direct the application of the labor of the Army to the same purpose. It was a courtesy to the United States which he was willing to yield, as a mere courtesy, that they make roads for the transportation of public property, for the purpose of economizing the expenditure. It would be found, on proper examination, that this chimera of the exercise of power not belonging to the Executive, and by him denied to Congress, had no existence in fact. There was some apology, Mr. N. added, for warmth on this subject; for the charge now preferred against the Executive was also to be found on record in the report of the Committee of Internal Improvement, made at the last session, where it was said, in express terms that the same power had been exercised by the Executive which the Executive had denied to Congress. Before this charge was made, some better evidence ought to be produced than the mere report of a newspaper.

I have already said, observed Mr. N., that I would not, on this occasion, enter into a discussion of the general question of internal improvement. But, in this debate, we have had, also, in some measure, introduced the conduct of General Jackson and the Executive in relation to the Seminole war. As there seems to be some excitement on this subject, and some gentlemen have already given their opinion respecting it, I too, will give mine. My opinion is, that General Jackson ought to be sustained by the Government and people of the country; and, instead of voting a censure on that illustrious officer, he has, for his conduct, the thanks of my heart sincerely. With respect to this sickly humanity which rouses every feeling of sympathy, and even of indignation, to appease the manes of the executed miscreants, who, without mercy, and without feeling, buried their tomahawks in the brains and bowels of the helpless families on our frontier, it was not by such goblins as had been conjured up here that the man who rescued the soil of his country from pollution on the plains of Orleans was to be beaten down. The people of this country will never forsake him, from a mockery of humanity, for having obeyed the dictates of justice. I will not, said Mr. N., anticipate the possibility of a decision of the country against General Jackson, however the newspapers may speak, and the friends of editors scribble to excite a morbid feeling against him, by which, I trust, the generous and manly feeling of this country will never be subdued or misled. If forced to a discussion of the conduct of General Jackson, Mr. N. concluded by saying, instead of censuring that man, he should have his approbation and thanks for the energy and ability he had displayed in the conduct of the Seminole war.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said that he threw himself upon the courtesy of the House for a few moments of their attention, while he tendered to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NELSON,) his profound acknowledgments for the favors he had received at his hands.

The gentleman, sir, said Mr. T., has, on the present, as on almost every other occasion, brought more of passion than of argument into the debate. He has addressed himself rather to the feelings than to the understanding; and, waiving the discussion of the matter of right, has met us by the overwhelming imputation of hostility to the Government. To me he has liberally imputed the design of hurling anathemas, and aiming the shafts of obloquy against the Executive for the violation of the Constitution—to all of us the desire of “embarrassing” that department, “by thrusting upon it” propositions which reduce the President to the necessity of deciding upon his Constitutional powers.

Sir, it has been somewhere said, with just severity upon the ill-directed efforts of misjudging zeal, “Oh! that mine enemy had a friend!” Surely, the indiscretion of friendship, which it implies, was never more forcibly manifested than in the conduct of that gentleman. If, as he has gratuitously and most erroneously supposed, the shafts of hostility have been aimed from any quarter at the distinguished gentleman who now fills the chair of the Executive, I submit to the House to determine whether it has not been the hand of that gentleman which has pointed the dart. Whenever a proposition has been produced, for exercising the power which we deem Constitutional—and when we have supported it by an appeal to the Executive acts, in our conception within the pale of its powers, the gentleman has never failed to assail us, by attacking those Executive opinions on which we relied for support. It is from him that we hear intimations of Executive “embarrassment” in the consideration of great Constitutional questions, on which that magistrate has already pronounced his opinions. The honorable member, is indeed, most singularly unhappy in the defence of the Executive. Is it true, as the gentleman has intimated, that on a bill containing an appropriation for making military roads, the President is likely to be “embarrassed” by this Constitutional question? Does the gentleman mean to be understood, that the Executive opinion has not been sufficiently weighed and deliberated, to enable that department to decide with promptness and consistency on the questions submitted to it? If he does, while it furnishes, on the one hand, reason to lament that those who defend, should think proper to attribute "embarrassment" to the Chief Magistrate, it affords, on the other, ample grounds for the prosecution of a measure which will present him with a fair and Constitutional opportunity of explaining, in extenso, the doctrines of the Constitution.

Sir, it is in the same spirit that the gentleman has pronounced that we are now reiterating, on the subject of military roads, a charge of violation of the Constitution by the Executive, which was advanced in the report on "roads and canals," of the last year, of which I was—perhaps unfortunately—the author. There was no such charge in that report; on the contrary, in support of a power in Congress to provide good roads for necessary military operations, as necessary to the war-declaring power, the committee relied on the acknowledged exercise, by the President, of the right to make military roads, as necessary to the power of commanding the Army, or of carrying on a war. Affirming the right of the Executive, (at least to a certain extent,) they inferred the power in the Congress of the United States, to provide, in time of peace, for the means of conducting a war to a happy and prosperous issue. They denied that the Constitution of the United States could have intended that this nation should ever be plunged in the trying scenes of war, without every necessary power for waging it with effect.

And we are now, it is said, pressing this charge once more upon the Executive. Who are engaged in this meritorious enterprise? If the gentleman is desirous of expelling me from the fold, by a frequent and entirely gratuitous imputation of views inimical to the Executive, will he place in the same hostile array the distinguished gentlemen with whom, on this, as on former occasions, I have had the honor to act? Will he include a large majority of this House, who a few days past, in committee, have united with me in voting for this proposition? Is it, indeed, contended, that the President has but a minority in this House, and that a large majority are engaged in thwarting his views, and "thrusting upon him" propositions, with a desire of embarrassing him in the discharge of his official functions? No, sir; such are not my objects; such, I feel authorized to say, are not the objects of those with whom I act. Their objects are legitimate and fair, as I shall be able to establish before I shall conclude.

But I am told that, before I venture to charge upon a high officer of the Government an act which violates the Constitution, it behooves me to come here better prepared than with newspaper evidence of the fact; and the gentleman has obligingly recommended to me a newspaper in Philadelphia, from which to draw my future anathemas. I have as little knowledge of its editor as that gentleman. The gentleman has been pleased to style me his friend. [Here Mr.

N. said Mr. T. might disclaim the title.] Mr. T. said, he had not disclaimed it; but I leave it to the gentleman's reflections to determine by what sentiments of friendship such remarks have been urged upon me. Sir, they have been improperly introduced into the debate; they have nothing to do with the question, and could have been suggested by no friendly disposition.

But we are told that we had other objects in view besides those which appear on the face of the proposition; we have the Cumberland road bill in view. True, we are not inattentive to it. We wish to present this appropriation in such a shape, that, if it meets support, that may also find it. The object in the variety of propositions which have been and will continue to be submitted on the subject of roads, is fair and legitimate. The subject is one on which a deep and growing interest is felt; and though it may be delayed or impeded by casual interruptions, the plan of national improvement must and will go on. Prompted by a desire to promote them, a majority of the House have manifested by the passage of former bills a wish to present the subject fairly before the President, that, if he approves those which we pass, it may be discovered how far he believes we can properly go; and if he rejects, he will, according to the directions of the Constitution, furnish his reasons in detail; thus clearly exhibiting his view of our Constitutional powers, and enabling us to proceed in their exercise as far as may consist with his opinion. Is this not desirable, both to us and to him? Is it not calculated to put an end to this never ending discussion as to our powers? Is it not fair and liberal to the Chief Magistrate to afford him an opportunity of distinctly defining his views of the Constitution, and of terminating these speculations as to the character of his opinions? I have heard it hinted, indeed, that the Cumberland road bill of the last session was intended to "entrap the President into an inconsistency." It is a poor compliment to the Executive Magistrate to suppose he was to be entrapped by a bill which contained but a single section, and the object of which was so distinct and definite. It was not framed, sir, with any such view. The public service required it. The Treasury Department suggested its necessity to provide for the fulfilment of contracts theretofore made by the Executive. It was moreover hoped, that, if rejected, we should have the reasons of the President; if approved, we might infer a more favorable opinion than the generality of the expressions in his first Message to Congress permitted us to hope for.

But, sir, I not only referred to the newspaper evidence of the National Intelligencer to prove that roads had been made, but I produced other evidence, from the Executive department, if the gentleman had deigned to attend to it. It was the report of the Secretary of War made at the last session upon a call of the House for further information as to the roads constructed under the direction of the President. By this document, it appears that several important roads had been constructed under the authority of the President, (without any specific appropriation by Congress,) and by the labor of the soldiery, to whom an extra compensation was allowed by law. Here then is evidence of the highest authority that roads have been constructed by the Executive department, the expense of which have been paid out of sums appropriated to general objects, without specifying roads. Sir, I have in this attributed no breach of the Constitution to the Military Department. On the contrary, in reply to the honorable Speaker, some days past, I remarked, that "the fault was in ourselves;" that we had voted for large appropriations without specification, though with an understanding that part of the sums appropriated were for the use of roads—under which understanding the War Department had acted. I am now anxious to put a stop to a procedure which seems to me not perfectly consistent with the provisions of the Constitution in relation to appropriations.

Sir, if we were again to pass this appropriation bill, with a lumping sum, out of which the War Department may make roads without any specific appropriation, there might then, indeed, be some plausibility in the imputation of an attempt to entrap the Chief Magistrate. By dividing the appropriation as we propose, he cannot but perceive that there is a sum set apart for military roads; a fact that might well escape attention, if in what the gentleman calls "the bolus" of $550,000 was covertly included this "contemptible sum," this "gnat" which he so much despises.

But, after all, what does this contested clause propose? Nothing more than that we should appropriate specifically, for work on military roads, the sum of $10,000, instead of leaving the work to be done, as heretofore, without a specific appropriation. We now authorize the work to be done. Before, it was done without any specific authority. We now appropriate the money specifically. Before, it was drawn from the Treasury under a general appropriation. In this consists all the difference between the state of things heretofore and that which we desire to introduce. Thus the attack upon the President consists in supporting a proposition in consonance with his acts, which the gentleman who supports him most zealously opposes!

I understand the gentleman as alleging that a vote in favor of this proposition would be inconsistent with the vote of a majority of this House at the last session of Congress. In this, sir, he is clearly mistaken. The first resolution on which the vote was taken at that time was in these words: "That Congress has power under the Constitution to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military, and other roads; and for the improvement of water-courses." This passed by a vote of 90 to 75.

And what is the proposition now under consideration? It is a clause in the appropriation bill to appropriate $10,000 to the construction of such roads for military purposes as may be deemed important.

The proposition now is in direct correspondence with the right affirmed then; and it will be extraordinary indeed, if, after an affirmation of the right by so large a vote, the appropriation should be rejected when none can deny its necessity.

Sir, I shall not undertake to examine the course of the gentleman himself. I am willing to extend the courtesy which I expect from others; and though I should find it vain to attempt to reconcile what seems to be the conflicting character of his opinions, I am willing to believe that he has some mode of explaining their apparent inconsistencies which is at least satisfactory to himself.

Mr. MILLER, of South Carolina, said, he did not think it important in any point of view that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio should be adopted. The amendment would not change the principle reported by the Committee of the Whole, which was nothing more than making an appropriation, to enable the Executive to use the soldiers of the United States in working on roads. All the gentlemen who have spoken on this subject (said he) seem to think no substantive power or law should be created by the appropriation bill. I answer, this clause in the appropriation bill does not give any additional power in relation to working on roads, but merely is a grant of money to enable the Executive to do that which the Constitution authorizes him to do; namely, to employ the soldiers of the Army of the United States as the commander of any army may, as commander of an army, employ the same. It seems to be established, by evidence of unquestionable character, that the soldiers of the Army have been employed in working on roads. This the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NELSON) has denied. The report and letter of the Secretary of War seem to me to be conclusive as to the fact, that the soldiers are thus employed. The only question that remains for determination is, will Congress, who, by the Constitution, is the only authority by which the army can be raised and paid, allow an additional compensation to the soldiers, while thus employed, under Executive direction, in working on roads? This involves two questions: first, the power of Congress to make this appropriation; and, secondly, the expediency of exercising it. The Constitution gives to the President a right to command the Army of the United States. Congress has the right to raise and support an army. It follows, that after an army is raised, the President is to command it, according to the existing laws in force, and according to the universally acknowledged rights of a commander. Now, I take it to be universally acknowledged, that the commander of an army may employ the labor of the army in working on roads, barracks, or fortifications, either with or without their consent. This arises out of the nature of his command; the soldiers are to submit to such regulations as the President shall adopt for the government of the Army. He can direct their movements, and has a qualified right to employ their labor in whatever way the benefit of the Army, or the interest of the nation, may require. There can be but little doubt, but what the President may employ the Army of the United States, constitutionally, in working on roads. If he can do so, the next question is, would it be expedient to encourage their employment in this way, by giving a premium of fifteen cents per day to the soldiers thus employed? The sum, thus to be employed, is too small for much evil to grow out of it, were we to suppose it improperly applied. This we have no right to suppose will be the case. We are daily compelled to submit greater and more important funds to the discretion of the President; and yet no fears upon the subject. We must presume he will use those powers which the Constitution has clothed him with, for the benefit of the country.

Look at many items of this bill, and you will see appropriations made upon various subjects, which imply a discreet application by the President. Thus the sum for the survey of the waters, &c., west of the Mississippi—where is the power in the Constitution for the President to effect this object, except he derives it from his character as commander of the Army? And yet nothing is apprehended as to the misapplication of this fund. I would ask if the President can, constitutionally, employ the Army in working on military roads? Can there be a more economical plan than to pay the soldier fifteen cents, when the same labor would cost one dollar by contract with private individuals in most places? The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NELSON) seems to think that the President will find it difficult to remove his objections against the powers of Congress to apply its funds to internal improvement, but it is now too late for such a supposition. Without any other than a general appropriation for the Quartermaster's department, under which head this item was embraced, the Executive has thus employed the soldiers; and surely now, because the same money is given in the same manner, except specially instead of generally, he will not refuse to sign the general appropriation bill, which contains nothing more than it did last year. If the President had not by his own acts shown his construction of the Constitution in relation to his own power as commander of the Army, there might be some ground to suppose, from his Message of the last Congress, that part of the appropriation would be exceptionable to him—but when he has availed himself of the appropriation made last year, thus to employ the Army, he will not be likely to refuse to sign a bill making an appropriation for the pay of the Army, when constitutionally employed by himself, for that purpose. Upon this part of the subject, the only difficulty seems to be in this, that the President, in his communication to Congress at the last session, intimates his opinion, that Congress have not the right by virtue of their powers of taxation to employ their own money, as any legislative body may employ their money, when, in the application of the money put at the disposal of the President, he has assumed, as a correct construction of the Constitution, that, by virtue of his rights as Commander-in-Chief, he can employ his army as any other commander may. But, this is no reason for our not legislating upon a specific proposition, in which, as far as there has been any expression of opinion, the executive and legislative branches of the Government all concur.

Before I conclude, I will notice a distinction taken by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PITKIN,) who supposes the President may, during war, as Commander-in-Chief, use his army in making roads, but not during peace. This distinction does not exist in the Constitution. That instrument declares that the President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army, &c.; there is nothing said about peace or war—he is, therefore, commander during peace as well as during war; and whatever any commander may do as commander, he may do in time of peace. By a declaration of war, new duties are imposed, but his character as Commander-in-Chief is still the same. Being, therefore, of opinion, that we can, constitutionally, make the appropriation, and that it will be expedient to do so, I shall vote for a concurrence in the amendment made in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, rose to state to the House some reasons which seemed to him to be conclusive against concurring in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, then under consideration.

He said that the amendment went to appropriate ten thousand dollars for extra pay to soldiers while engaged in working on, and repairing, military roads. The question, as to the power of Congress upon this subject, had been so much discussed at the last session, that he believed the subject, and the patience of the House, had been alike exhausted. He should not, therefore, at this time, make a single remark in relation to it, except to state the fact, which was sufficient for the purposes of his present argument, that there was great diversity of opinion among the members of this House how far that power extended. Some gentlemen, said he, are of opinion, that Congress can construct roads; others that they cannot construct, but may appropriate money for their construction; while others think that they can do neither. Some think that the power belongs to Congress; others that it appertains to the President, as Commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, to make the necessary military roads for the passage of the troops, and the transportation of munitions of war. Some think there ought to be a specific appropriation, while others contend that it had better remain as a part of the item for the Quartermaster's department; in short, said he, there is so much diversity of opinion among us, that it might be said, without a figure, that we agreed in nothing but to disagree. This is the character of the amendment. Let us now, for a moment, examine the kind of bill to which it is proposed to be added; it is, sir, the military appropriation bill, containing provision for the pay, subsistence, and all the incidental expenses of the Military Establishment for the present year; about not one item of which is there the least difficulty or question, as to principle, except in relation to the one now under consideration. No, sir. As to all the other provisions of the bill, the only question which has arisen has been one of quantity—a question of more or less—how many dollars shall we appropriate to this or that object of expenditure? He would ask the House, then, whether it could be correct to complicate with a bill, as to which we all agreed, or, if we disagreed, our opinions might be easily compromised, and thus terminate in an act of legislation, one single principle, so much contested, as the subject of the proposed amendment? He would ask the House to look at the consequences to which it would lead. It would coerce a very large minority of the House finally to vote against a bill, which, in all its provisions but one, they not only approved, but which might be considered an act of legislation of course; inasmuch as, if we kept up an army, it must be paid and subsisted.

As it respects the President, he would ask whether it was not in effect introducing into Congress the system which at one time prevailed in the British House of Commons, and which had been technically called tacking? When that House wished a redress of grievances, it attached a provision therefor to the supply bill for the year; then tendered the alternative to take both or neither. Sir, said Mr. B., if the President should, as some suppose, reject this bill upon the ground of this appropriation, what then would follow? He believed, and he referred to the vote of the last session, when we were almost identically the same members, in support of his opinion, that there would not be found a Constitutional majority to pass the bill. Let us, then, refuse to concur in the proposed amendment; let us pass this necessary bill, and there is yet a plain and obvious mode by which gentlemen can attain the object which they have in view. It has been said that it is desirable that the opinion of the President should be expressed directly upon this question. I am desirous, too, that both the President and Congress should express a direct opinion on the question; and this, sir, is the mode which I propose.

Let the subject-matter of this amendment be introduced into a substantial and independent bill, or incorporated, as an amendment, into a bill upon the subject of internal improvement, just reported by the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals; then the question will be discussed and decided upon its own merits; and this affords an answer to an objection which was urged in argument. It was said that the money used to pay for work on military roads had hitherto been drawn from the item for the Quartermaster's department, and, if we struck out this specific appropriation, it would be left in a doubtful state. Mr. B. said he thought there could not be a possible difficulty. When this bill was first reported, the item for the Quartermaster's department did contain $10,000, intended for working on roads. We have, however, by a vote in the Committee of the Whole, diminished that item precisely by the amount of $10,000, and avowedly with a view to present it in the shape of a specific appropriation; now let us strike this specific item from this bill, and then present it in either of the ways which have been pointed out; the result will be, that both departments of the Government will have decided directly upon the question, and the opinion of Congress cannot be mistaken. Under this view of the subject, he earnestly hoped that the proposed amendment would not be concurred in.

After some further remarks from Mr. RHEA against the amendment, the motion of Mr. BEECHER to amend, and several other motions to amend were successively negatived, and the main amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole (to insert a specific appropriation for defraying the expense caused by soldiers working on roads) was concurred in—yeas 90, nays 75, as follows:

TUESDAY, January 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Alabama Territory, to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. WILKIN, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Aquilla Giles," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Ordered. That the several orders of the day, which precede the bill for the relief of Adam Kinsley and Thomas French, be postponed until to-morrow.

The House resumed the regular order of the day, and went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Kinsey and French.

Some discussion took place on the merits of their case, as well as on that of Charles S. Leonard, for whose relief it was proposed, by Mr. RICH, to add a section to this bill, comprehending the said Leonard in its provisions. This was finally agreed to in Committee, and subsequently by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed.

The SPEAKER communicated to the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the debts, credits and funds of the banks of the District of Columbia, rendered in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 7th instant.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants for services rendered during the war of the Revolution.

On motion of Mr. HERBERT, the Secretary of the Treasury was instructed to report to the House a statement of the debts, credits, and funds of all the banks in the District of Columbia, not embraced in the terms of the resolution of the House a few days ago.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the annual report of the Commissioners, with sundry statements in relation to the Navy Pension Fund, which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House another letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting sundry papers, being copies of letters and extracts of letters to the commanding naval officers, which contain all the instructions which have issued from the Navy Department in pursuance of the act of Congress prohibiting the importation of slaves, passed on the 2d day of March, 1807, in obedience to a resolution of the House on the 4th instant.

SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. T. M. NELSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, delivered in the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred that part of the President's Message, of the 17th November, 1818, which relates to the proceeding of the court martial, in the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, and to the conduct of the war against the Seminole Indians, report:

That after a perusal of the various documents submitted to Congress, on the subject of the Seminole war, they find much difficulty in separating the responsibility of the commanding officer to his Government, from the obligations of the United States to Spain. But, as the occupation and capture of Pensacola and St. Marks are subjects of negotiation and correspondence at this time, between the two Governments, and as the Committee on Foreign Relations will probably consider this part of the President's Message more immediately connected with their branch of the subject, your committee will confine themselves, in this report, to the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister.

On the 26th April, 1818, a general order issued at headquarters, Fort St. Marks, by Major General Jackson, signed by Colonel Robert Butler, Adjutant General, detailing "a special court martial, to meet at 12 o'clock, A. M., for the purpose of investigating charges exhibited against A. Arbuthnot, R. C. Ambrister, and such others, who are similarly situated, as may be brought before it."

Your committee do not deem it necessary to attach to their report the proceedings of that court, as every member of the House has been furnished with several copies, to which reference can be made.

Your committee can find no law of the United States, authorizing a trial, before a military court, for such offences as are alleged against Arbuthnot and Ambrister, (except so much of the second charge as charges Arbuthnot with "acting as a spy," of which part of the charge the court found him "not guilty;" nor, in the opinion of your committee, does any usage authorize, or exigency appear from the documents accompanying the report of the trial, which can justify the assumption and exercise of power by the court martial, and the commanding General, on this occasion. It is admitted, as a maxim of the law of nations, that, where the war is with a savage nation which observes no rules, and never gives quarter, we may punish them in the person of any of their people, whom we may take, (belonging to the number of the guilty,) and endeavor by this rigorous proceeding to force them to respect the laws of humanity. Wherever severity is not absolutely necessary, mercy becomes a duty. In vain has your committee sought, among the documents on the subject of the Seminole war, for a shadow of necessity for the death of the prisoners arraigned before the court. The war was at an end, to all intents and purposes—the enemy's strongholds had been destroyed—many of them killed or taken prisoners, and the remainder, a feeble band, dispersed and scattered in every direction. The Spanish fort of St. Marks, which it was supposed, (and no doubt justly,) had protected them, was also in our possession, and so entirely was the war considered to be terminated, that the Georgia militia, under General Glasscock, had returned to their homes. Then where was the absolute necessity which alone could warrant a departure from the exercise of that clemency, of which the United States has heretofore so justly boasted?

Your committee find, in the general order of the 29th April, in which General Jackson orders the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, this remarkable reason, intended as a justification of the executions, principally of Ambrister, but applying to both Arbuthnot and Ambrister: "It is an established principle of the law of nations, that any individual of a nation, making war against the citizens of another nation, they being at peace, forfeits his allegiance, and becomes an outlaw and a pirate." It may be asked by what system of interpretation the offences charged could be considered as piracies, which imply, in common acceptance, offences upon the high seas, of which the court could not assume cognizance; and it is equally difficult to understand the propriety of the application of the term "outlaw," to the offenders—a term, which applies only to the relations of individuals with their own governments. It will not be pretended, that Lafayette, who volunteered his services in the cause of America, in the war which established our independence, forfeited his allegiance, became an outlaw, and subjected himself to an ignominious death, had he fallen into the hands of the English. Or can it be believed that one voice would be heard in justification of Spain, if she were to execute such of our countrymen as she may make prisoners, while fighting in the armies of the South American Patriots? And if these cases should not be considered of such a nature, as to warrant a resort to so severe a measure, while they occurred with a people in a state of revolution, and considered by the parent countries to be in a state of rebellion, much less could these men (Arbuthnot and Ambrister) be considered liable to it, who were acting with a Power, acknowledged and treated as sovereign and independent by us.

Your committee beg leave to call your attention particularly to the case of R. C. Ambrister, who, after having been subjected to a trial before a court which had no cognizance or jurisdiction over the offences charged against him, was shot by order of the commanding General, contrary to the forms and usages of the army, and without regard to the finding of that court, which had been instituted as a guide for himself.

Your committee must here, in justice to their own feelings, express their extreme regret, that it has become their duty to disapprove the conduct of one who has, on a former occasion, so eminently contributed to the honor and defence of the nation, as has Major General Jackson; but the more elevated the station, the more exalted the character of the individual, the more necessary is it, by a reasonable, yet temperate expression of public opinion, through the Constitutional organ, to prevent the recurrence of incidents at variance with the principles of our Government and laws.

Nor can your committee forbear including in their strictures the court martial who sat on the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambrister. A court martial is a tribunal invested with limited jurisdiction, having for its guidance the same rules of evidence which govern courts of law; and yet Arbuthnot is refused by the court martial, before whom he was on trial for his life, the benefit of the testimony of Ambrister, who had not been put upon his trial at that time, and whose evidence would have been received by any court of law as legal, if not credible. Many other exceptions might be made to the evidence recorded in these proceedings: particularly to the question put to the witness Hambley, viz: "Do you believe the Seminoles would have commenced the business of murder and depredation on the white settlements, had it not been at the instigation of the prisoner, (Arbuthnot,) and a promise, on his part, of British protection?" Answer: "I do not believe they would, without they had been assured of British protection." A leading question is expressly forbidden to be used by a court martial, by Macomb on Martial Law, and of which the court must have been apprized, as it is a work common in the army, and usually referred to by every court martial when in session; and the question was calculated to elicit an expression of opinion and belief from the witness, rather than a statement of facts, upon which alone could the court act. Hearsay evidence, in a case of life and death, your committee will venture to assert, was never before received against the accused in any court of this country, and yet, on the face of the record of the proceedings of the court martial, hearsay testimony is admitted, which had been received from an Indian, who, if present, would not have been allowed to give evidence himself.

After mature deliberation, your committee beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States disapproves the proceedings in the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, also of the Military Committee, submitted a paper drawn up in the shape of a report by that committee, which, by a majority of one vote, that committee had refused to accept, and the said paper was read as follows:

"The committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the Seminole war, and the proceedings in the trial of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister, report:

That General Jackson, in a short, though sanguinary war, with the Creek nation of Indians, brought them to terms of peace; and in the Summer of 1814, a treaty was concluded with them, wherein they ceded to the United States a territory embracing several millions of acres of land; the effect of this cession was, the cutting off the Indian establishments between the settlements of the United States in Georgia and Alabama, and the Spanish territory. This object being obtained, future peace and safety to our citizens, in that quarter, were confidently anticipated; but, contrary to these just expectations, it was discovered that a hostile disposition was still entertained by the Seminole tribe of that nation, aided by fugitive negroes, and incited by foreign incendiaries. It having been represented to the Government, that murders had been committed on our defenceless citizens, General Gaines was ordered, in the Summer of 1817, with a considerable force, to take a station in that section, for their protection. General Gaines was directed to keep within the territorial limits of the United States, and abstain from every attempt to cross the Florida line; but to demand of the Indians the perpetrators of the crimes thus committed, in order that punishment might be inflicted upon the guilty, without involving the innocent, and without a general rupture with these deluded savages. The fact of such murders having been ascertained, attended with aggravating circumstances of rapine and cruelty, General Gaines, in conformity with his orders, made the demand. The savages, through the deceptive representations of foreign incendiaries, were led to believe that the strength of the United States was not sufficient to subdue them; or, if their own forces were incompetent to sustain the conflict, they would receive assistance from the British. These promises, made by these unauthorized agents, were predicated upon a pretence, that the United States had bound themselves, by the Treaty of Ghent, to restore the lands which the Indians had ceded, previously to that Treaty, at Fort Jackson; and that the British Government would enforce its observance. Under this influence, they not only refused to deliver the murderers, but repeated their massacres whenever opportunity offered; and, to evade the arm of justice, took refuge across the line, in Florida. In this state of affairs, in November, 1817, Lieutenant Scott, of the United States Army, under General Gaines, with forty-seven persons, men, women, and children, in a boat on the Apalachicola river, about a mile below the junction of the Flint and the Chachooche, was surprised by an ambuscade of Indians, fired upon, and the whole detachment killed and taken by the Indians, except six men, who escaped by flight, (one of whom was wounded.) Those who were taken alive on this occasion, were wantonly murdered by the ferocious savages, who took the little children and dashed out their brains against the side of the boat, and butchered all the helpless females, except one, who was afterwards retaken. General Gaines was not yet authorized to cross into Florida, to enforce a compliance with his demand for the delivery of the murderers, while the Indians were collecting in large numbers upon the line, which they seemed to think a perfect safeguard, and from which they continued their predatory incursions, as opportunity permitted. A letter from the Secretary of War, of the 9th December, 1817, authorized General Gaines, in case the state of things should continue, and it should become impossible, by any other means, to prevent their depredations, to exercise a sound discretion as to crossing the Florida line, to break up their establishment; and, on the 16th of the same month, the Secretary of War, by letter, directed to General Gaines, fully authorized him to cross the line, and attack the Indians within the Spanish territory, should they still refuse to make reparation for depredations already committed—unless they should shelter themselves under a Spanish fort, in which case he was directed to notify the Department.

Intelligence being received by the War Department of the massacre of Lieutenant Scott and his companions, General Jackson was directed, by letter of the 26th December, 1817, to repair to Fort Scott, and take command of the forces in that quarter; with authority, in case he should deem it necessary, to call upon the Executives of the adjacent States for such additional force as he should deem requisite; in which he was referred to the previous orders given to General Gaines, and directed to concentrate his forces, and adopt the measures necessary to terminate a conflict, which had been avoided from considerations of humanity, but which had now become indispensable, from the settled hostility of the savage enemy. In January following, the Secretary of War, in a letter to General Gaines, says, "The honor of the United States requires that the war with the Seminoles should be terminated speedily, and with exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked." Under these orders, and in this critical state of affairs, General Jackson, with that zeal and promptness which have ever marked his career, repaired to the post assigned, and assumed the command. The necessity of crossing the line into Florida was no longer a subject of doubt. A large force of Indians and negroes was making that territory their refuge, and the Spanish authority was either too weak or too indifferent to restrain them; and to comply with orders given him from the Department of War, he penetrated immediately into the Seminole towns, driving the enemy before him, and reduced them to ashes. In the council-house of the King of the Mickasukians, more than fifty fresh scalps, and in an adjacent house upwards of three-hundred old scalps, of all ages and sexes, were found; and in the centre of the public square a red pole was erected, crowned with scalps, known by the hair to have belonged to the companions of Lieutenant Scott.

To inflict merited punishment upon these barbarians and to prevent a repetition of these massacres, by bringing the war to a speedy and successful termination, he pursued his march to St. Marks, when he found, in corroboration of previous information, that the Indians and negroes had demanded the surrender of that post to them; and that the Spanish garrison, according to the commandant's own concessions, was too weak to support it. Here he ascertained that the enemy had been supplied with the means of carrying on the war, from the commandant of the post; that foreign incendiaries, instigating the savages, had free communication with the fort for carrying on their intrigues; councils of war were permitted by the commandant to be held by the chiefs and warriors within his own quarters; the Spanish store-houses were appropriated to the use of the hostile party, and actually filled with goods belonging to them; munitions of war were furnished them, and property, known to have been plundered from our citizens, purchased from them by the commandant, while he still professed friendship to the United States. General Jackson, therefore, had no hesitation to demand of the commandant of St. Marks the surrender of that post, that it might be garrisoned with an American force; and, when the Spanish officer hesitated to deliver it, he entered the fort by force, though without bloodshed, the enemy having fled, and the garrison being too weak to make opposition. Convinced of the necessity of rapid movements, in order to the ultimate success of the expedition he immediately marched his forces to Suwaney, seized upon the stores of the enemy, and burnt their villages.

Having thus far effected his object, General Jackson considered the war at an end. St. Marks being garrisoned by an American force; the Indian towns at Mickasuky and Suwaney destroyed; the two Indian chiefs, who had been the prime movers and leaders of the savages, one of whom had commanded the party that murdered Lieutenant Scott and his companions, and the two principal foreign instigators, Arbuthnot and Ambrister, being taken and executed, General Jackson ordered the Georgia militia to be discharged, and was preparing himself to return to Tennessee. But he soon learned that the Indians and negroes were collecting in companies west of the Apalachicola, which would render it necessary for him to send a detachment to scour the country in that quarter. While preparing for this object, he learned that the Indians were admitted by the Governor into Pensacola, and enjoyed free access to that town; that they were collecting in large numbers, 500 being in Pensacola on the 15th of April, many of whom were known to be hostile, and had just escaped from the pursuit of our troops; that the enemy were furnished with ammunition and supplies, and received intelligence of the movements of our forces from that place; that a number of them sallied out, and murdered eighteen of our citizens, settlers upon the Alabama, and were immediately received by the Governor, and by him transported across the bay, that they might evade the pursuit.

These facts being ascertained by General Jackson from unquestionable authority, he immediately took up his line of march towards Pensacola, at the head of a detachment of about 1,200 men, for the purpose of counteracting the views of the enemy, and to execute his orders from the War Department, by terminating the war speedily, and with exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked. On the 10th of May he crossed the Apalachicola at the Ocheese village, with the view of scouring the country west of that river; and, on the 23d of the same month, he received a communication from the Governor of West Florida, protesting against his entrance into that province, commanding him to retire from it, and declaring that he would repel force by force, provided he should not obey. This communication, together with the evident indications of hostility in the Governor, who had been well advised of the object of General Jackson's operations, determined the measures which he pursued. Accordingly, he marched directly to Pensacola, and with but the shadow of opposition took possession of that place the following day, the Governor having fled to Fort Carlos de Barancas, which post, after a feeble resistance, was also surrendered to General Jackson on the 29th; by which the Indians and fugitive negroes were effectually deprived of all possible means of continuing their depredations, or screening themselves from the arm of justice. Thus gloriously terminated the Seminole war, a war reluctantly entered into, but urged by dire necessity, to protect from the tomahawk and scalping-knife of the most ruthless savages our peaceful frontier settlers, who, from decrepit age to helpless infancy, for more than two years had been exposed to their cruelties—a war in which our citizens and soldiers, with their usual fortitude and valor under their persevering and determined commander, endured long and difficult marches, submitted to painful privations, subdued a brave and merciless enemy, without suffering one defeat, or betraying a solitary mark of dismay to tarnish the lustre of their country's glory. A variety of circumstances convinced General Jackson that the savages had commenced this war and persisted in their barbarities under the influence of some foreign incendiaries, more criminal than the uncivilized natives. Alexander Arbuthnot, who avowed himself a British subject and resided among the savages as an Indian trader, was taken at St. Marks, to which place he had withdrawn as danger approached, and was living as an inmate in the family of the commandant. It appearing that he had been a zealous advocate for the pretended rights of the savages, and in this respect the successor of the notorious Colonel Nichols, of the British colonial marines, in the late war with Great Britain; that he had repeatedly written in their behalf to the Spanish Governor of St. Augustine, the Governor of the Bahamas, the British Minister in the United States, and to Colonel Nichols, endeavoring to procure aid from both those Governments against the United States; that he had repeatedly advised the Indians not to comply with the Treaty of Fort Jackson, assuring them that the lands ceded to the United States by them in 1814 were to be restored by virtue of the treaty of peace with Great Britain; General Jackson ordered him to be tried by a court martial, consisting of thirteen respectable officers, with Major General Gaines president. The court was directed to decide upon the fact of his guilt or innocence; and, if guilty, what punishment should be inflicted. Upon satisfactory testimony he was convicted of inciting and stirring up the hostile Creeks to war against the United States and her citizens, and of aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, supplying them with the means of war, and by the court sentenced to be hung. Robert C. Ambrister, late a Lieutenant of the British marine corps, and with the hostile Indians and fugitive negroes, the successor of Woodbine, of notorious memory, was taken near the mouth of Suwaney river. It being well known that he had been a leader and commander of the hostile Indians and fugitive slaves, General Jackson also directed him to be tried by the same court martial. Upon satisfactory evidence, he was convicted of having aided and comforted the enemy, supplying them with the means of war, by giving them intelligence of the movements and operations of the Army of the United States, and by sending the Indians and negroes to meet and fight against them; and upon his own confession, as well as the clearest evidence of having led and commanded the Lower Creeks in carrying on the war against the United States, was by the court sentenced to be shot. One of the members requesting a reconsideration of the sentence, it was agreed to; and, on a revision, the court sentenced him to receive fifty stripes on his bare back, and be confined with a ball and chain to hard labor for twelve calendar months. General Jackson approved the sentence in the case of Arbuthnot, and in the case of Ambrister he disapproved the reconsideration, and confirmed the first sentence. They were both executed accordingly. In relation to these transactions, questions of the first magnitude present themselves, which the committee have deemed it their duty to investigate. Was General Jackson justifiable, after marching his army across the line, into the territory of Spain, in taking possession, by force of arms, of the Spanish posts, St. Marks and Pensacola? Had he the right to punish Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister?

From the facts submitted, it is perfectly evident that the Spanish authorities in Florida did not retain that neutral character which was necessary to render its territory sacred; but, by their own acts, either of hostility or imbecility, they made that territory the seat of war. Independent of the solemn obligations of treaty, whereby Spain engaged to keep the Indians within her territory at peace with the United States, no principle is more firmly established by the laws of nations than this, that a nation at war has the right to pursue the hostile army into the territory of a neutral nation, and to make that territory the seat of war, when either the weakness or partiality of the neutral nation shall suffer the belligerent army, retreating into its territory, there to rally, collect strength, and provide supplies, to enable them to renew the conflict, and especially when munitions of war have been supplied, either by the citizens or authorities of the neutral nation.

But, in the consideration of this subject, it should never be forgotten that Spain was bound, by the solemn stipulations of treaty with the United States, herself to have fought these battles; or, if too weak to have done so, at least to have made common cause with the United States against these lawless tribes of savages. The United States have never recognised the Indians, within her territorial limits, as nations absolutely independent; hence it has ever been considered the duty of the Executive, when they have been guilty of murders and depredations upon our citizens, either in plundering parties or in the more formidable aspect of Indian armies, to order against them the military force of the country, or call into service the militia, as the case may require, to check their barbarities and to punish their crimes.

In accordance with this principle, the Executive has ever acted since the commencement of the present Government. Repeated and bloody depredations upon our southern frontier, in which peaceful husbandmen, defenceless women, and innocent children, were made the victims of savage ferocity, not only rendered it necessary to put into operation the military force of the nation, but the sheltering of the Indians beyond the limits of the United States gave occasion for the orders to General Jackson to pursue them beyond these limits. If Spain regards the Indians in the same light, it was a duty no less incumbent upon her by the laws of nations than by treaty, to have repressed their lawless depredations; and, in her agents' failing to do so, if, through neglect, they made themselves parties in the war; or, if through weakness, they forfeited the right of sovereignty in that territory where they failed to maintain it. But, if Spain regards the Indians as communities absolutely independent, then the territory, by right of occupancy, belonged to the Indians, and not to Spain, and the invasion was of the enemy's territory. Had the commandant of the Spanish post, at St. Marks, done his duty in withholding from the enemy supplies, and in denying them a refuge within the reach of his own fort, the necessity of interrupting his garrison would not have existed; nor is it presumed that any attempt would have been made by General Jackson to possess himself of that post. And it is also presumed that his orders to respect the Spanish posts were predicated upon this supposed state of things. But as the object of the entrance into Florida was the reduction of the Indian force—to bring the Seminole war to a speedy and successful termination, which was exhausting the blood and the treasure of the nation, it was a duty which he owed to his country to effect that object. Any result short of this would have only increased the evils which it was his duty to correct; and this could not be effected while Spanish fortifications were appropriated to their defence, and yet regarded as sacred by him. To have retired with his forces under such a combination of circumstances, which would have confirmed the erroneous impression entertained by the Indians and by the Spanish authorities, of the sacred character of their places of refuge and of succor to our ferocious enemy, would have perpetuated the war, and given it the character of permanency, which the honor of the United States required should be speedily concluded, and with the most exemplary punishment. The commandant at St. Marks himself acknowledged that his command was at the mercy of the Indians and negroes; he ought, therefore, to have hailed the approach of General Jackson, with his American forces, as a deliverer, and to have co-operated with him in the common cause, when he was assured that the object was a military occupation, for the express purpose of putting an end to the Seminole war, and not for conquest. But the facts present this subject yet in a much stronger light to the committee. The Indians received not only shelter, but comforts and munitions, and all the facilities for carrying on the war which a Spanish army could have received from that post. Did this conduct, on the part of the Spanish commandant, result from a hostile disposition? If so, he became a party in the war. Or was it the effect of imbecility, as his professions of great friendship would imply? If so, the act of garrisoning St. Marks with an American force, bears no character of hostility to Spain, but was warranted by the law of nations—by the treaty with Spain, and by the first law of nature—self-protection. Had the Governor of West Florida maintained the neutral character which was confidently expected, and which it was his duty to have done, the Seminole war had here ended, and our flag would not have been unfurled in that territory. The Indian establishments at Mickasuky and Suwaney broken up—their villages burnt—their supplies cut off—St. Marks occupied by our troops—their power in East Florida was entirely annihilated.

In the firm conviction that the war was ended, General Jackson had ordered the Georgia militia to be disbanded, and was upon the point of returning himself with the Tennessee and Kentucky volunteers, when he learned that the object of the campaign was not yet entirely accomplished.

The vanquished enemy, crossing into West Florida, where the authorities of Spain proved as imbecile as in the eastern province, renewed their depredations, by their incursions into the adjoining territory of the United States, and committing murders upon our frontier settlers. Every circumstance, which not only justified the act, but which rendered it an imperative duty for him to enter the Spanish territory of East Florida, was equally applicable to the act of his crossing the Appalachicola, to break down the power of the enemy in West Florida. But the conduct of the Governor, taken in connexion with the circumstances which induced the entrance into Pensacola, rendered its occupancy by General Jackson, if possible, yet more palpably necessary than that of St. Marks. Well apprized of General Jackson's object, that he had not entered the Floridas in hostility to Spain, but to do that which Spain was bound to do, both by treaty and by the laws of nations, to give security to our own citizens, within our own territory, by destroying the power of the savage foes, the Governor of Pensacola, in equal violation of the laws of neutrality and of humanity, succored those enemies, supplied them with munitions of war, sheltered and conveyed from the hand of justice those of them who were returning from the bloody fray: and when General Jackson was executing the righteous mandates of an injured and indignant nation upon them, the Governor commanded him to depart from the territory, threatening to oppose force by force, should he not comply. Thus circumstanced, what should General Jackson have done? Should he have been induced, by the unprovoked and gasconading menaces of a foreign Governor, to retrace his steps? Or, should he have remained stationary, until he could have despatched a messenger to the Executive for instructions how to act? This would have ill become an American General, whose movements were sanctioned by the sacred laws of nature and of nations, and by the solemn stipulations of the foreign Prince, as well as by the authority of his own Government.

Should he have left it in quiet possession of a savage foe? This would have defeated the whole object of the war. There was but one course, in the opinion of the committee, which he could pursue, consistently with the honor of the nation and the safety of its frontier citizens. The Governor of West Florida, by his own act, had become a party with the savages in this war; or had, at least, by his imbecility, forfeited the right of sovereignty within the territory; and the occupancy of the Spanish posts in that province, by General Jackson, was, in the opinion of the committee, a sacred duty which he owed to himself, to his army, to the Government, and to his country. While this nation scrupulously regards the dictates of justice in her intercourse with all nations, civilized and savage, it is a duty which she owes to her own character and to the safety of her citizens, to assert her rights and avenge her wrongs. In relation to these movements, it appears to your committee that the Executive has sanctioned the act of General Jackson, in the occupancy of those posts, by requiring that condition which the laws of nations and the treaty with Spain justify, in order to the restoration of St. Marks; and if Pensacola is not held subject to the same condition, this does not imply a relinquishment of the right, but should be regarded as the evidence of an amicable disposition towards Spain.

The committee now enter upon the other point; that of the trial and execution of the foreign instigators—Arbuthnot and Ambrister—a subject of more delicacy and tenderness, as it involves the lives and liberties of individuals; yet of equal magnitude, and, in the opinion of the committee, of equal clearness. In ancient times, when barbarism more generally prevailed, and even polished nations seemed unconscious of the ties of humanity, which ought ever to bind the whole family of mankind in tenderness and affection, the practice obtained of putting to death the soldiers and even the citizens of a vanquished enemy, by the sword, and even by the public execution, or of holding prisoners of war in slavery for life, and entailing bondage upon their posterity. But the progress of civilization, aided by the benign influence of Christianity, has, in modern days, produced a radical change, highly honorable to the civilized world.

In consequence of this principle, it follows, that although, when one nation enters into war with another nation, all the citizens of those nations may be considered, in some respects, as enemies to all the citizens of the other; yet they have not a right, in all cases, when they meet, to act in hostility to each other; because women, children, and all others who are exempted from bearing arms, and those employed in rural and other peaceful occupations, are not the proper objects of hostility; nor is it admissible to take the lives of those who fall into the power of their enemies, after they have surrendered; because such act is now unauthorized by the laws of nations, and ever has been a violation of the laws of humanity. So, when armies meet in the field of battle, the soldier who lays down his arms and asks for quarter, is entitled to his life; and the same with garrisons and whole armies; if they offer to capitulate, in cases of great extremity, it is an established principle of the laws of nations, universally acknowledged where civilization prevails, that their lives cannot be justly taken, unless their gross violation of the rules of civilized warfare render it necessary to inflict death as a punishment for their crimes. But death, in such cases, is never the righteous fate of unsuccessful war; much less are peaceable citizens, unarmed, pursuing their lawful avocations, subject to death, or any other acts of hostility calculated to injure them, either in their persons or effects; because such citizens do not offer injury. But, from this general principle and universal practice among Christian nations, another principle arises, as universally acknowledged and equally consonant to the laws of nature and nations, that when a nation, either savage or civilized, departs from these rules, and grossly violates the laws of nations and of humanity, retaliation, or reprisals, are always justifiable, often useful, and sometimes essentially necessary, to teach the offenders to respect the laws of humanity, and to save the effusion of blood.

In such cases, where the guilty persons can be taken and identified, the punishment ought to fall exclusively upon them. Yet reprisals are not, necessarily, even confined to the persons of the guilty; but the laws of war justify the punishment of the offending nation, in any of the persons of the enemy. This nation, ever regarding mercy as her delight, has heretofore abstained from the exercise of this power, though the principle was recognised in the case of Captain Aegill, in the Revolutionary war, and by President Madison, in which it received the sanction of the Legislature, in the late war. When at war with savages, who respect no rule, and are governed by no laws, whose known mode of warfare is indiscriminate murder of all ages, sexes, and conditions, it is a well established principle that their crimes may be lawfully punished in the persons of any of their people; and the citizens or subjects of any civilized nation, by engaging in their warfare, either in personal hostility or by instigating, aiding, and abetting them, thereby identifying themselves with the savages, belong to their nation during the continuance of such engagements, and are, by the true and acknowledged principles of the laws of nations, subject to the same treatment. When reprisals shall be made by inflicting retaliatory punishment upon foreigners thus identified with savages, it is justifiable upon the principle of reprisals alone, and not because they become outlaws and pirates; for the laws of nations justify the citizens or subjects of one nation in entering the service of another nation; and, during such service, they are considered as parts of the nation which they serve, subject to the same treatment, in all respects, as if they were its natural citizens or subjects.

It was upon this principle that the Marquis de Lafayette, Barons Steuben and De Kalb, and General Kosciusko, entered the American service in the Revolutionary war, which was never considered as a just occasion for war, by Great Britain, against France, Prussia, or Poland; nor yet as a cause for regarding them in the character of outlaws and pirates. But, had these distinguished men fallen into the hands of Great Britain, the laws of war would have entitled them to the same tenderness, and subjected them to the same conditions, as native Americans. The same principle is equally applicable to those who enter into the service of the savages.

The universal principle of savage warfare, elicited by their general practice, is that of the most cruel and aggravated murder; not only of their enemies taken in arms, but also of peaceful unarmed citizens, helpless females, and tender infants. If instances have been known wherein they spared the lives of persons falling into their power, these instances have been too few in number, compared with the massacres which they have committed, desolating whole settlements, and murdering whole garrisons, to give an opposite character to their general practice.

The desolation and ruin of the Wyoming settlement, in the Revolutionary war, and the recent massacres at Fort Mimms on the river Raisin, in perfect accordance with their general history, from the commencement of our national existence, furnish sufficient demonstration of this fact.

Alexander Arbuthnot was taken as a resident among the savages, with whom he had identified himself, by acting as their agent, exciting them to the war, aiding, abetting, and supplying them with the means of carrying it on. Robert C. Ambrister was taken in their actual service, as a leader and commander of their forces; by which, as well as by aiding, abetting, comforting, and supplying them, he was also identified with the savages. Agreeably to these principles of the laws of nations, the committee are fully of opinion that General Jackson, as commander of the army, had the right to exercise upon them the law of retaliation, without the intervention of a court martial. However cautiously this rule should be exercised, and desirable as mercy always is, whenever it can be exercised with safety, this godlike virtue has its bounds, beyond which its exercise would be a perversion of justice; and it is presumed that the repeated murders which had been committed upon our citizens, the many bloody trophies of their cruelties found at Micasuky, and their persisting in hostility against the repeated warnings and threats which had been held out to them, bore conviction to the mind of General Jackson, that the exercise of the law of retaliation had become necessary to the future safety of his fellow-citizens.

But he chose to submit the case to the investigation and decision of a court martial, composed of distinguished officers, by whom Alexander Arbuthnot was condemned to be hung, which sentence was confirmed and executed. By the same tribunal Robert C. Ambrister was, in the first instance, condemned to be shot; but, upon reconsideration, they changed the sentence to that of corporal punishment and confinement to hard labor. The reconsideration was disapproved by Gen Jackson, and the first sentence confirmed and executed. On this last point the committee are of opinion, that it would have been more correct for General Jackson, after submitting the case to a court martial, not only to examine the facts as to his guilt, but to determine the punishment to be inflicted, to have acquiesced in their final and only legal decision as a court. But in this the committee are satisfied that General Jackson did not transcend the power warranted by the laws of retaliation—the prisoner's own confession, and the evidence produced, going to establish the facts which justified its application. And though the principles of national law, involved in this war, would have authorized a more extensive sacrifice, even on the persons of the innocent, yet the committee deem it a matter of great felicitation that punishment fell upon the guilty alone; and that the object is effected with so limited an example of justice. Under this view of the whole subject, the committee can discover much which merits applause, and little that deserves censure; and, from the incalculable benefits resulting to the nation, from the faithful and distinguished services of General Jackson, and the officers and men who served under his command, in terminating finally the Seminole war, are of opinion that they are entitled to the thanks of their country.

The report having been read—

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, rose to make a motion, the object of which was to give to the report of the Military Committee, as well as to the substitute presented by a member of that committee, a direction which should insure to it a discussion, as full as was desired, at the present session. For this purpose, he moved to refer them to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. These papers, he said, involved principles of great consequence, on which in some measure depended, as he believed, the character of the nation; they also necessarily involved important questions as to the laws of nations, and as to the Constitution of our own country, and ought to have a deliberate consideration.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, was as desirous as the gentleman from Georgia of a deliberate discussion of the subject of these reports; but, if they were referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a motion to go into which was always in order, the House might be taken by surprise, or brought into the discussion entirely without notice, at the motion of any gentleman who wished it. He therefore wished the papers should be referred, as in ordinary cases, to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STROTHER, of Virginia, agreed, with the gentlemen who had preceded him, that the report should be so disposed of as to insure a full examination of its merits. The subject, he said, was one of considerable interest and excitement, though he was not under the impression that it was one of great magnitude, nor that it carried in its bosom the fate of the nation, as the gentleman from Georgia seemed to suppose, which depended on far other considerations. The best course to pursue in regard to these papers, Mr. S. thought, would be to lay them on the table. Though not of momentous consequence, he said, yet the decision on them was calculated to implicate the character, and perhaps the happiness, of the illustrious individual whose proceedings it was proposed to censure. He would, in regard to any proposition involving the happiness or reputation of any individual, conspicuous or obscure, act with great deliberation. He was therefore opposed to referring this matter to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, thus putting it in the power of any individual to call it up when he pleased, and to precipitate the House into a discussion unadvisedly and unprepared. He was for not hastily acting on a proposition to censure a man who had given celebrity to the arms of his country, and thrown a brighter lustre on the national character.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, said he hoped that the House would never agree to a report, in affirming which the House would be required to forget the wrongs inflicted on us by foreign nations, to overlook the inhuman deeds committed on the frontier of Georgia, and to turn its attention to the laudable object of destroying the reputation of one of its most distinguished citizens. It was not in the point of view in which the gentleman from Georgia had regarded the question; it was not from any regard to the savages of Florida, and their allies, British refugees and Spanish agents, or from a wish to crush that man by the strong arm of power—that man who had so much merited the thanks of his country, that he wished a full and early discussion of the subject. He did not wish it, he said, to be referred to a Committee of the Whole, or to lie on the table and be forgotten. He was not willing that any such report as that from the Military Committee, calculated to ruin the reputation of a man who had rendered so signal services to his country, should be considered as representing the opinion of this House. He was not willing, therefore, that it should remain for a moment on the table, but should undergo a full discussion as early as practicable; which would be insured by referring it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, while he congratulated the House on the dignified report which the Military Committee had presented to them, was disposed, in the proceedings on this subject, to act with all necessary deliberation. The only objection he had heard to the proposition to refer the subject to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was, that it might be called up at any time; this objection, he said, might be entirely obviated by naming a day when it should be called up; and, if a day were not named, the House would always have it in its power, if it chose, to refuse to go into Committee if moved for at too early a day. He should deplore, Mr. M. said, perhaps more than any member of the House, that this should be referred to an ordinary Committee of the Whole, and that the whole session should pass off without an expression, on the part of the House, of its opinion on this subject. With respect to the character of General Jackson, though he would not unnecessarily arraign it, Mr. M. said, he looked, in the view which he took of the importance of this question, to higher objects—to the character of this House and of this nation.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, hoped that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia would prevail. He presumed that the gentlemen adverse to General Jackson were none of them desirous of precipitating the discussion, or taking any advantage, by surprise, of those who approved of his conduct. He supposed that by Monday next every gentleman who desired to take a part in the discussion would be prepared, and that that day would be agreed on. He said he should, when the discussion came on, attempt to show that all the proceedings of General Jackson were justifiable by the law of nations.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, wished the papers to lie on the table, that the members of the House might have an opportunity of examining them; but, if referred to any committee of the House, he wished the substitute as well as the report to be referred—and that, in their publication, they might go together, that the world should see and understand the views of both sides of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, suggested the propriety of a concurrence, on all sides of the House, in the commitment of the report and the amendment to a committee, as proposed. If for no other reason than that the Speaker might wish to participate in the debate, he should approve of that course. The subject had excited considerable sensation, and he hoped every opportunity would be given to members, on all sides of the House, to express their opinions. To debate it now was to take up the time of the House to no useful purpose whatever.

After some further remarks from Messrs. FLOYD, COBB, and STROTHER, in support of their respective opinions, and some conversation on a point of order, the question on referring the report of the Military Committee to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was carried without a division.

On motion of Mr. DESHA, the paper offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, as a substitute, was then referred to the same committee; and

Mr. TALLMADGE gave notice that, if no one else did, he should, on Monday next, move to go into a Committee of the Whole on this subject.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1819, was read the third time; and the question on its passage was decided, by yeas and nays, in the affirmative, by a vote of 107 to 57, as follows:

[The ground of the opposition to this bill is the clause it contains, specifically appropriating ten thousand dollars for extra pay for the soldiers' work in the repairs and construction of roads; this provision being considered to involve the principle of the Constitutional power of the General Government to make roads within the several States. Had this clause been excepted, it is supposed the bill would have passed nem. con.]

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "respecting the Military Establishment."

[The first section proposes to add to the corps of engineers one Brigadier General, one Lieutenant-Colonel, two Majors, two Captains, four First and four Second Lieutenants; and to give the same pay and emoluments to that corps as to those of the corps of ordnance. The second section provides that the corps of heavy artillery shall consist of four regiments, and of four additional Colonels, and that promotion in that corps shall be governed by the same rule as in the infantry. The third section provides that the Quartermaster's department shall, besides the chief of that department, consist of six Majors and two Captains. The fourth section provides that, in case of allowance by law to officers for servants and forage, certificates of the servants having been employed, and the forage used, shall not be required. The fifth section provides the pay of the Commissary General, and authorizes the addition, to the officers under him, of two Deputy Commissaries, taken from the line, with the rank and pay of Majors of Ordnance. The sixth section proposes to allow the Surgeon General the same pay as the late physician and surgeon general, and in a small degree raises the compensation of regimental and post surgeons. Section seven provides for the privilege of franking to the heads of the Staff departments, and allows two clerks to each of the offices of Chief of Engineers and of Ordnance, of the Commissary of Subsistence, and of the Medical Department.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, with a wish to try the principle of the bill, to which he was wholly opposed, moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

On the suggestion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, a letter from the Secretary of War to the Military Committee was read, recommending the adoption of the provisions of the bill, as necessary to equalize the standing of different corps, and for the purpose of enforcing economy in the public expenditure.

Mr. DESHA supported the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, and went into an examination, section by section, of the provisions of the bill, which he disapproved as generally unnecessary, but some parts of them more so than others. He particularly denied that economy would be promoted by a bill which proposed so great an increase of expenditure.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, observed that he was always anxious to satisfy the inquiries of any gentleman on every subject which had been investigated by the military committee, and by them reported in the form of a bill. In the proposition before the Committee, the sole object was to perfect the most rigid system of economy in every branch of military expenditure. No new system, said Mr. J., is now proposed. But a small modification in the staff department of the army, in perfect harmony with the general system already established, it is believed, will prove highly beneficial in effecting the object contemplated, by producing the highest degree of responsibility. Heretofore the laws of the United States, in relation to the Military Establishment, have effectually imposed responsibility upon agents employed for the disbursement of money, while they have in a great measure failed to carry that responsibility to the articles purchased. The bill regulating the staff, passed at the last session, introduced the principle upon the present system. The experience of one year has proved its utility, but disclosed imperfections in its detail, which the present bill is designed to correct. The various branches of the staff department are placed under the direction of men highly distinguished for honor, honesty, industry, economy, capacity, and experience. The present bill goes to effect the object of imposing upon them that rigid responsibility for property intrusted to them, which will not only secure the proper application of the more costly articles of military equipment, such as cannon and small arms, but to render them accountable for every cartridge, flint, and screw; and if the perfecting of this system will incur a direct expense to the country of a few thousand dollars, it is reduced to an absolute certainty that it will prove ultimately of a great saving, probably in a more than tenfold ratio to the expense. In vain, said Mr. J., shall large sums of money be expended in the purchase of ordnance stores, quartermasters' stores, commissary stores, and medical stores, unless this property shall be preserved uninjured, and applied exclusively to the public service. Many thousands of dollars, during the late war, and even before that period, were lost, forever lost to the nation, for want of this system.

The gentleman from New York, said Mr. J., has expressed an anxiety to know why we retain in service such a large proportion of officers, for the military peace establishment, compared with the rank and file of the army? In reducing the war to the peace establishment, it will be recollected that we retained only the usual number of officers to each company, battalion, and regiment, and it is not known that any supernumeraries are retained. Experience has pointed out a certain organization, in which no radical change has been introduced; no increase of officers of the rank and file of the army has taken place. The staff is independent of the rank and file, and should always be so organized as that a war would effect no derangement or embarrassment in the system. The experience and extensive knowledge of that gentleman, upon a moment's reflection, will suggest to him that the staff of the army must be more extensive in its arrangement than the mere rank and file. It must embrace the vast extent of our maritime and territorial limits, which now extend from Maine to Orleans, from Orleans to St. Peters, on the river Mississippi, near the falls of St. Anthony, Mackinac, and Green Bay, in the North, and from Boston to the Yellow Stone, nearly two thousand miles up the Missouri. This vast frontier is necessarily embraced by the military department of the Government; and such posts have been and are about to be established as will not only secure us from invasion and predatory incursions, but which give practical demonstration of the power and utility of the War Department, under judicious and faithful management. It was upon this principle that the United States retained ten thousand men, rank and file, independent of the staff of the army, the general staff, the ordnance department, the engineers, the national armories, and the military academy. The duties of the staff embrace also the preparations made in time of peace, for defence, in permanent works, fortifications, arsenals, magazines, and military stores of all descriptions, in every part of this vast and growing Republic, and a sudden increase of our military force to fifty or a hundred thousand men would require no other increase of the staff of the army than such officers as would be attached to each corps for the duties of the camp and the field. Without this general and permanent staff, we should experience great disorder, even in time of peace; and in the event of war, complete derangement and confusion.

The first section of the bill provides, said Mr. J., for an increase of the number of officers of the engineer corps, and places them upon an equality with those of the ordnance department. The utility of this measure will appear obvious to the Committee, if gentlemen will take into consideration the vast importance of that corps, their laborious services, and the benefit derived to the country from the faithful discharge of their duties. It must always be composed of scientific officers. Their duty embraces a military survey of the whole United States. No nation should be destitute of the most intimate knowledge of its own territory, its vulnerable points, its strongholds, and everything necessary to prepare it for defence in every quarter; and no nation can possess this knowledge in such a degree as to be able at all times to make the most advantageous arrangements, without an able and well organized engineer corps. They have been advantageously employed for some time past in surveying the seaboard, and are now extending their views to the rivers and lakes; and it is contemplated to employ them upon the waters of our Western frontier, where their services are highly important at the present time. But the present number is found quite inadequate to the duties required. The prospect of the benefit to be derived to the country from their services is truly flattering, if this provision of this bill shall meet the sanction of the Legislature. In addition to the military advantages which constitute the leading object of the measure, they will furnish information to the civil department, for roads, canals, bridges, and such other improvements as shall become objects of public attention, either to the General Government or to State authorities. Their discoveries will tend to disclose the hidden treasures of the New World. Their researches will advance the knowledge of the natural history of the United States; give us a more extensive acquaintance with the geography of our own country, which is yet in its infancy, and continue to extend this useful and necessary branch of knowledge, till we become familiarly acquainted with the regions of the Rocky Mountains, in the wilderness of the West. While thus enriching the nation with the knowledge of its own territories, their services will prove essentially beneficial, in pointing out from time to time the most suitable points for military establishments, to secure us from the influence of foreign emissaries upon the Indian tribes within our limits, to protect from depredation our frontier settlements, so rapidly extending by clouds of emigrants from the overflowing States of New England, who seek in the Western wilderness comfortable abodes for themselves and their posterity.

The modification proposed by the bill in the Quartermaster's department, is to increase the number of deputy quartermasters general, from two to six, with the rank and emolument of majors of infantry; and to reduce the assistants from sixteen to twelve, whose rank and pay are equal to that of captains in the infantry. This will cause a small increase of direct expense to what is now incurred under the present system, but will still fall very far below the expense incurred under the former system. Before the present arrangement, the annual expense of this corps was 27,096 dollars; under the present system, it is only 13,068 dollars, and with the proposed modification it will not exceed 17,000 dollars. Experience has suggested the necessity of this modification. In the important branch of public expenditure confided to this department, the interest of the nation requires that men of capacity and experience in business should be employed; and it is found that the mere pay and emoluments of a captain are not sufficient inducements to command the services of such men as ought to be employed at the most important points, on whom such high responsibility devolves, and on whose ability so much depends.

The bill, said Mr. J., goes to provide a direct increase of pay to the medical staff; the necessity of which is also founded upon experience. It is scarcely necessary to touch upon the importance to the whole army of this branch, and the utility of its commanding the service of scientific and skilful practitioners. Unless some further inducements shall be held forth, to retain in the service such men of the medical profession as are calculated for real usefulness, the army will be continually suffering from resignations and changes of the most injurious kind. The present system is calculated to prevent untaught, pretended physicians from obtaining appointments; but the compensation allowed is not sufficient to invite their continuance, after a sufficient experience to enable them to pursue a private practice to advantage. It is well known that the most learned of that highly respectable profession require a series of practice to render them highly useful, either in the army or to the community; and, owing to the inadequacy of the compensation, resignations are become so frequent that it seems as if the army were only designed for the first school of experience, and with no other benefit than to supply the country with a sufficient number of experienced practitioners in medicine and surgery. The health of the army is vitally important to all its objects; and it is but just to the soldier, as well as beneficial to the country, that the medical department should be well arranged and well supplied. To induce a continuance in the service, after qualified by experience for greater usefulness, it is now proposed to allow a small increase of pay after a certain period of faithful service; which increase will be of no considerable account to the United States, but will probably prove an eventual saving of many thousands of dollars beyond the direct amount of expense. The frequent resignations which have taken place in the medical staff have rendered it necessary often to employ citizen physicians, involving an expense considerably beyond the amount of the additional pay now proposed; so that it is confidently believed the proposed modification unites the most perfect economy with the best service to the country. Other parts of the bill, Mr. J. said, would scarcely need explanation, and he would not detain the Committee by going over them; but, if any gentleman should desire it, when they were taken up by sections he would willingly give any information within his power. The leading object of the bill, said Mr. J., is to combine economy with utility, to the greatest possible extent, so that one shall not overpower the other; but that both may harmonize in the advancement of the interest and safety of the nation.

Mr. COLSTON, of Virginia, was in favor of the recommitment of the bill to the Military Committee with a view to examine into the practicability of effecting some reduction in the Staff of the Army. He acknowledged that an increase might be necessary in some of the departments of the Army, but he was of opinion that a corresponding reduction in others could and ought to be made.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, supported the views which Mr. JOHNSON had taken of the bill, and elucidated, by various facts and arguments, the expediency of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. DESHA acknowledged that he had been rather inattentive to the principles of the bill, but when he heard his colleague (Mr. JOHNSON) say that it was calculated to economize, the expression roused him—believing that that gentleman, in consequence of his extreme liberality in relation to the military, (arising from the natural goodness of his heart,) had measurably laid aside the word economy. He therefore had requested time to examine the provisions of the bill more particularly, and he now, without hesitation, pronounced the substance of every section of the bill to be the reverse of economy. Mr. D. said he would go through the bill section by section, examine its provisions, and attend to their bearings; and he had no doubt but he could convince the House that it ought not to pass. The first section related to the corps of engineers; the corps as it now stands consisted, he believed, of twenty-two officers, that is, one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, two majors, six captains, six first and six second lieutenants. The duty of the engineers is to fix on eligible sites for erecting batteries, or fortifications, direct their construction, and to direct the artillery; he knew it was important to have skilful engineers, and it is acknowledged the present engineers were of that character, and he believed the number amply sufficient. He contended that batteries or fortifications was not the defence we rely on; you must rely for defence on the yeomanry of the country, it is their activity and zeal in the cause of liberty, that will deter foreign despots from attacking you, or encroaching on your rights; yet a few fortifications may be necessary, and how many will you want to erect in a season, certainly not more than five or six; one skilful engineer will only be wanting to fix on the site of a fortification, and superintend its construction. You will want, perhaps, three or four topographical engineers to be engaged in surveying and examining your coasts and waters; then you still may have about one half on furlough, independent of the number necessary to superintend the Military Academy. You contemplate by this bill, adding fourteen to the present number; that is, one brigadier general, one lieutenant-colonel, two majors, two captains, four first and four second lieutenants. And what do you want with a brigadier general to command thirty-five men dispersed over the country, as they must be, if they are employed in the line of their duty? In addition to this, the bill contemplates giving to the corps the same pay and emoluments that you give the corps of ordnance, which is raising the pay nearly one-fourth. This is economizing with a vengeance to it!

The second section contemplates organizing the corps of heavy artillery into regiments, instead of battalions, as it now stands. He recollected the arguments in favor of forming the artillery into battalions were, that in consequence of their being dispersed over the country, so that there would not be even a major's command at any one point, there was no necessity of forming them into regiments; will not the same reason hold good now; are they not more dispersed now, than they were at the time of their organization into battalions? They certainly are; because your posts have been increased, you scarcely will have at any one post more than a captain's command: then, he asked, where is the necessity of reorganizing them into regiments, unless it is to make room for more officers, and that of a higher grade? The bill contemplates adding four colonels to the corps. You have now in the corps of heavy artillery, agreeable to the last Army Register, four lieutenant colonels, four majors, thirty captains, thirty-two first lieutenants, sixty-four second lieutenants, and fifteen third lieutenants, making one hundred and forty-nine officers. Is not this number amply sufficient? He thought more than sufficient: but now you are about to add more officers of a higher grade, and we are told this is economizing. He said, by this kind of economy the people would soon have empty pockets.

The third section relates to the Quartermaster's department, and perhaps is as little objectionable as any part of the bill; but this is so far from going on the principles of economy, that it raises the pay of all the officers attached to the department nearly one-fourth higher than it is at present—by making the pay and emoluments of the officers of the corps the same as the officers of the corps of ordnance of equal grade. As the law now stands, officers of the army are bound to make it appear that they actually kept the servants they are allowed in service, before they could receive pay for them; but, by the fourth section of this bill, they are not bound to give a certificate, consequently it is now considered as an emolument attached to office. According to existing regulations, a major general is entitled to four servants, and a brigadier to three; if this bill passes, one servant will probably be kept by each; then you add twenty-four dollars to the pay of the major general and sixteen to the brigadier. Agreeable to the existing law, officers who exercise their functions on horseback, are entitled to a certain number of horses, according to grade, and are allowed eight dollars per month for forage for each horse, but gets pay for none only those he actually keeps in service, and is bound to certify to the number kept. Agreeable to this section, the officer is not to certify to the number of horses actually kept in service, which is also to be considered as an emolument attached to office. Agreeable to existing regulations, a major general is allowed seven horses, a brigadier general five, a colonel four, and other officers according to grade; neither of those officers will require more than two horses in time of peace—then there is thirty dollars more added to the pay of the major general; this, with the twenty-four in the case of the servants, makes fifty-four dollars per month; add this to the two hundred dollars, his monthly pay, and it makes two hundred and fifty-four dollars per month—and so on to other officers, according to grade, and still my colleague says this bill is economizing.

The fifth section relates to the Commissary's department. I was opposed to the adoption of this measure last session, not that I was pleased with the contract system, as I knew it had defects, but I believed it might have been so amended as to have been a cheaper mode of supplying the Army, and equally safe as to certainty of supplies in time of peace, than the one adopted; which, it appears, as I anticipated, will not answer well without bolstering, but as it is shortly to go into operation, I am willing that it should have the necessary props, if they are not too expensive a character, agreeable to the law as it stands, exclusive of the head of the department. The President of the United States has the power of appointing as many assistant commissaries as he may think proper who are to be taken from the subalterns of the line, with twenty dollars per month addition to their pay in the line. This bill contemplates appointing, in addition to the officers now authorized, two deputy commissaries, with the brevet rank, and the pay and emoluments of majors of ordnance, and allowing the numerous assistants that will necessarily be wanting, to be taken from the citizens, with the pay of fifty dollars per month, and two rations per day which makes the pay equal to sixty-two dollars per month. He believed the system at first to be an expensive and improvident one, and he had yet seen no cause to change his opinion. If this is adopted, it will be abundantly more expensive; yet we are told that the whole bill goes on the principles of economy; and in addition to the officers he had mentioned, the head of the department is to be a brigadier instead of a colonel.

The sixth section relates to the surgeons of the Army. A regimental surgeon is now allowed forty-five dollars per month, and three rations per day, equal to sixty-three dollars per month. By this bill they are to have fifty dollars per month, and four rations per day, equal to seventy-four dollars per month. A regimental surgeon's mate is now allowed thirty dollars per month and two rations per day, equal to forty-two dollars per month. Agreeable to this bill they are to have forty dollars per month and three rations per day, equal to fifty-eight dollars per month. A post surgeon is now allowed forty dollars per month and two rations per day, equal to fifty-two dollars per month. And agreeable to this bill they are to be allowed forty-five dollars per month and three rations per day, equal to sixty-three dollars per month. If the pay of the surgeons is too low, let it be raised openly, and not in this indirect way. If we act correctly, praise will be our reward instead of censure. The people, who are virtually the governors in this country, ought to know what we are about. If the pay is too low, let us say so, and raise it openly; but indeed gentlemen, who were favorable to raising their own pay, cannot, in justice, refuse to raise the officers' pay, because the same difficulty attaches to them that did to us—the depreciation of paper money; but whatever is done, ought to be done openly, and not by way of side-wing. We now come to a part of the section that looks a little singular indeed. We are afraid to trust this subject with subsequent Congresses, but undertake to provide for this class of officers as long as they live. Does it not show a great degree of vanity or arrogance in us to pass a provision of this kind? That each regimental surgeon and surgeon's mate, &c., shall have an additional allowance of five dollars per month and one ration per day at the expiration of the period of every three years, which is an addition of eleven dollars per month; but lest it should be thought we were running wild, a proviso is added, that in no case shall the pay and emoluments of an assistant surgeon general exceed those of a colonel of ordnance, which is about one hundred and sixty-two dollars per month; those of a regimental surgeon, of a colonel of infantry, which is about one hundred and forty-seven dollars per month; those of a post surgeon, of a lieutenant colonel of infantry, which is about one hundred and fourteen dollars per month; and those of a surgeon's mate, of a major of infantry, which is about ninety-eight dollars per month. Here is economy with a vengeance! Are we to empty the people's pockets, and bankrupt the nation, in bolstering up the military? Is everything in this Government to bend to the military?

The seventh section gives the liberty of franking to the engineer, quartermaster, ordnance, commissary of subsistence, and medical departments, and gives each of the heads of them two clerks with the same salaries that are allowed to the two clerks in the adjutant and inspector general's office. Here you have a number of separate departments to which you attach high pay and privileges, as well as clerks to do all the labor, leaving only the responsibility to the heads, and yet we are told this is all for the purpose of economizing.

Although the eighth and last section has rather an innocent appearance, it is extremely mischievous in its operation. It assigns one of the subalterns as a conductor to each regiment of infantry, with an addition of ten dollars per month to his pay in the line. The additional pay is no object; but his duty is to receipt and account for all ammunition, implements, and all military stores furnished the regiment. By this regulation you take the responsibility from the colonel of the regiment, and place it on a subaltern officer. It is now the colonel's duty to attend to this business; he is also responsible for the whole; you by this regulation not only relieve him from the labor, but from the responsibility. Can this conduce to the welfare of the service? He apprehended not. Mr. D. said he had gone through the bill; in doing which, his object was to show its different bearings; gentlemen would judge whether it is calculated to economize or not; for his part, he thought it an extravagant and expensive measure. It is calculated to raise indirectly the pay of officers considerably, which, if necessary, let it be done openly, that the people can understand it. It is calculated to increase your staff considerably, which is unnecessary, as we have already the largest staff in the world, according to the number of the Army. Our Peace Establishment is but ten thousand men, and we have a staff sufficiently numerous for one hundred thousand men. It removes responsibility from high officers, where it ought to rest, and places it on subordinate officers, which cannot conduce to the welfare of any corps, and, instead of its being calculated to economize, it will prove extravagant throughout. We have now the most expensive army in the world according to its size. To think of ten thousand men costing annually about six millions of dollars; is it not alarming? and by the adoption of this bill you increase the expense considerably. The Secretary of the Treasury has told you that we will shortly have to resort to loans or internal taxes to meet the demands. This would not be a desirable state of things; had we not better retrench our expenses, in order to ward off this difficulty, than to adopt a bill calculated to increase expenses?

The question was then taken on striking out the first section of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—73 to 52.

The Committee then rose.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, expressed his desire that the further consideration of this subject should be delayed until the House should have received the information it had called for, of the strength, &c. of the Army; and,

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

Mr. RHEA reported a bill to provide for the payment of the pensions of persons under guardianship to their guardians, which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of Nicholas Jarrott, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill for the relief of the said Nicholas Jarrott, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill confirming certain claims to land in the Territory of Illinois.

Mr. MIDDLETON, from the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States, reported a bill, in addition to the acts, prohibiting the slave trade; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the report made at the last session upon the subject of the colonization of the free people of color.

The Committee last mentioned were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of "The New York Society for promoting the Manumission of Slaves, and protecting such of them as have been or may be liberated," and the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion of Mr. PINDALL, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a further time to the guardians of the minor children of deceased soldiers, to relinquish their claims to bounty lands for five years' half pay, as provided by the second section of the act, entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes," approved the 16th of April, 1816.

On motion of Mr. CROWELL, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the friendly chiefs and warriors of the Creek Indians to sell to the United States all their right and claim to such lands as have or may be reserved and located for them in the Alabama Territory, in obedience to the first article of the treaty of the 9th of August, 1814, making the reservation, and the law of Congress authorizing the location.

On motion of Mr. HERRICK, the Committee on Roads and Canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of commissioners to survey, lay out, and mark a road from the west bank of the Ohio river, opposite the point where the Cumberland road strikes the same, through St. Clairsville to Columbus; from thence to the western line of the State of Ohio, in a direction to St. Louis, in the Territory of Missouri.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Doctor Mattrom Ball," with an amendment. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act further to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands, for failure in completing the payment thereon;" in which amendment and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill for the relief of Doctor Mattrom Ball was read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to amend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands, for failure in completing the payment thereon," was read the first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate to enable the people of the Alabama Territory to form a State government, was twice read and committed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Adam Kinsley, Thomas French, and Charles L. Leonard, was read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Poole; the bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Turner, deceased; and the bill for the relief of Henry Davis, severally passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to the officers and crews of gunboats 149 and 154, was taken up in Committee; the blank filled with $5,482, and the bill ordered by the House to be engrossed.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Kenzie and Forsyth. The bill provides payment for a number of horses and mules which had been employed by the garrison at Fort Dearborn, to remove their baggage and supplies at the time of the evacuation.

Mr. SCOTT moved an amendment to provide payment for a quantity of whiskey and powder, belonging to individuals, destroyed with the fort. This amendment was opposed by Messrs. RICH and STORRS, and advocated by Mr. SCOTT. The amendment was rejected, and the original bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Committee proceeded to take up the bill for the relief of John B. C. Lucas and Clement B. Penrose (allowing them additional compensation as land commissioners in Louisiana.)

This bill created also considerable discussion; after which the Committee rose and reported the bills to the House; the former of which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the latter, after much additional discussion of its merits, was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of Isaac W. Norris, administrator of Joseph Summerl, late of the city of Philadelphia, praying to be allowed and paid the drawback on a quantity of merchandise, exported in the year 1816, by the late firm of Summerl and Brown, which is withheld, in consequence of their not taking the necessary oaths within the time prescribed by law, owing to a mistake on the part of a clerk in the custom-house.—Referred.

SALE OF PUBLIC LOTS IN WASHINGTON.

The House, on motion of Mr. COBB, proceeded to the consideration of the bill reported at the last session, explanatory of the act for the sale of certain public lots in the City of Washington, [authorizing the sale of the open space between the square and the Pennsylvania avenue, so as to extend the lots sold to the line of the avenue.]

The question before the House was, on concurring in certain amendments reported by the select committee, not affecting the object of the bill, and which were concurred in.

Mr. COBB, then, succinctly explained the object and the operation of the bill, dwelling briefly on the utility of the change proposed, in enhancing the value of the ground to be sold, without producing any inconvenience or injury to individuals; the great convenience which would result from bringing the improvements up to the line of the Pennsylvania avenue, instead of diverging therefrom, as would be the case without this alteration. He read the contract with the original proprietors, and argued to show that the contemplated sale would not contravene that contract; that the question involved in the sale, for private purposes, of the public reservations of ground in the city, was settled by the act which heretofore passed, directing the sale, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the bill with much earnestness, arguing that it would be a violation of the contract with the original proprietors; that it would be highly inexpedient to cut up and sell these public reservations, they being necessary to the health, comfort, and convenience of the citizens, as well as the beauty of the city, and were intended to be kept open for these purposes. He viewed the plan as originally adopted, in the nature of a compact between the Government and the purchasers of lots in the city, which could not rightfully be departed from. He cautioned the House against the effects of intrigues, which were frequently carried on by individuals, merely to improve the value of their own property, or injure that of others; remarking, that if any change were once made in the plan of the city, that half the time of the House would hereafter be taken up in attending to similar subjects, and illustrated his opinions by reference to proceedings of a like nature in Baltimore. He himself was among the first purchasers of lots in this city, and was deeply interested in it. His purchases were predicated on the belief that the plan of the city would never be altered. The plan he thought the most admirable one that was ever laid—one great excellence of which was the open spaces left by the public reservations, one of which it was now proposed to sell, which were so much wanted in all large and compact cities, and the great benefit of which, Mr. S. believed, would be hereafter felt here, as he had no doubt it would, in time, become a great city, and a place of great business. The original proprietors, Mr. S. believed, had entered their protest against these sales, and had got the court to stop the sale under the former act; and a court of justice, he hoped, would never permit Congress, or any other power, to deprive individuals of their right.

Mr. HERBERT went into a minute investigation of the subject to prove (as well as he could be heard) that the bill, as amended, was inconsistent with the original contract with the proprietors of the soil; and he read many documents to establish his arguments. He was in favor of such a course as would leave the original proprietors at liberty to seek a remedy in a court of justice.

Mr. BARBOUR wished the bill to be laid on the table, as some questions appeared to be involved in it which ought not to be decided hastily. He wished to give these questions more reflection; though, from the hasty view he had taken of these reservations, it appeared to him that they were intended for public uses; and, though he believed the plan ought not to be changed, yet if it were, and these reservations were applied to private purposes, it would present a question of some difficulty; but in its decision, he did not think the interest of the purchasers of lots entered into the question at all, as they bought under the ordinary chances and contingencies. Mr. B. moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. COBB replied, that the House had had time enough to make up its opinion on the subject, as the bill had laid on the table a part of the last session and the whole of the present, and hoped it would not again be laid by.

The question was carried, to lay the bill on the table, by a large majority.

THURSDAY, January 14.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplementary to, and to amend the act, entitled "An act to continue in force an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," passed the 3d day of March, 1817; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to reduce the duties on certain wines, and to declare free of duty books printed in foreign languages.

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were discharged from the further consideration of the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of fixing a standard of weights and measures.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD made a report on the petition of Lieutenant Bartlett Hinds, which was read; when Mr. B. reported a bill for the relief of the said Lieutenant Bartlett Hinds, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War, made in obedience to a resolution of this House, of the 18th of April last, instructing him to report a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress to the purpose of opening and constructing such roads and canals as may deserve and require the aid of Government, with a view to military operations in time of war; and, also, a statement of the works of the nature above-mentioned which have been commenced, the progress which has been made, and the means and prospect of their completion; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, (unless the communication of the information be, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest,) whether any application has been made by any of the independent Governments in South America to have a Minister or Consul General accredited by the Government of the United States, and what was the answer given to such application.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, and Mr. SETTLE were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions, made a report unfavorable to the petition of Benjamin Simmons; but, on motion of Mr. HUBBARD, and after debate, the report was reversed, and the committee instructed to report a bill for the relief of the petitioner.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Benjamin Poole was read a third time.

[This bill proposes to indemnify Benjamin Poole, an assistant assessor in one of the collection districts of New Hampshire, for the amount of a judgment given against him in the Supreme Court of the State of New Hampshire, in consequence of his having levied a tax on the property of a clergyman, under sanction of the opinion of the attorney of the United States, of the district court, and of the Attorney General, that the real property of clergymen was liable to the direct tax.]

Considerable debate took place on this bill, principally on the nature of the judgment, which, it was contended by Mr. MILLS and others, had been rendered on a case made up without a trial of the facts by the jury, in such a manner as to authorize Congress to interfere. This objection was answered by Messrs. CLAGETT, LIVERMORE, and others; and the bill passed without a division.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting sundry papers and statements, showing the different places in which provision is made for the accommodation of seamen, under the several laws relating to navy and marine hospitals, the number of persons, as near as can be ascertained, annually accommodated at each, and the expense attending the same; transmitted in obedience to a resolution of the House, of the 17th of April last; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The engrossed bills for the relief of Henry Davis; for the relief of Kenzie and Forsyth; authorizing the payment of a sum of money to the officers and crews of gunboats numbered 149 and 154, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of the Marquis de Vienne, and that for the relief of M. Poirey, both aids de camp of the Marquis Lafayette during the Revolutionary war, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, after a few remarks from Mr. HARRISON, in their favor, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill, reported at the last session, for the organization and discipline of the militia of the United States.

The bill was read through, when the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

NEW YORK CIRCUIT COURTS.

The House then, in prosecution of the orders of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to alter the time of holding the circuit courts in the southern district of New York, and for other purposes.

This bill passed this House at the last session, was sent to the Senate, and passed by that body with amendments; and, in this state, presented to the House a new question, under the rule which continues the business of the last session over to this.

It was contended by Mr. CLAY, that it was for the House to proceed to act on the bill, without reference to what might in this respect be the rule of the Senate; and by Messrs. LOWNDES, NELSON, TAYLOR, and PIRKIN, that this bill, having actually passed both Houses, except in regard to an amendment, could not be considered as comprehended within the rule.

The discussion resulted in the Committee's rising, leave to sit again being refused, and the bill being indefinitely postponed, by a vote of 55 to 51.

FRIDAY, January 15.

Mr. BARBER, of Ohio, presented a petition of Phoebe Champe, widow of the late John Champe, a sergeant major, in Lee's legion of horse, in the Revolutionary war, and who was employed by General WASHINGTON, in a highly important and secret service, and which is particularly detailed, in the 30th chapter of "Lee's Memoirs of the War, in the Southern Department of the United States," praying for a pension and for a grant of land.—Referred.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel B. Beall; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Samuel Gibbs.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of John D. Carter; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill for the relief of John Wilmot.

Mr. COLSTON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to authorize and empower the President and Managers of the Washington Turnpike Company, of the State of Maryland, when organized, to extend and make their turnpike road to or from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to the line thereof;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands, for failure in completing the payment thereon," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made a report, which was read; when, Mr. S. reported a bill providing for the abolition of the Indian trading establishments of the United States, and providing for the opening of the trade with the Indians, to individuals; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill to prohibit the Choctaw tribe of Indians from settling or hunting on the lands of the United States west of the Mississippi.

Mr. SOUTHARD also reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to select such tribes of Indians as he may think best prepared for the change, and to adopt such means as he may judge expedient in order to civilize the same; which was read the first and second time, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

On motion of Mr. PINDALL, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for delivering up persons held to labor or service, in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill; and, Messrs. PINDALL, ANDERSON, of Kentucky, and BEECHER, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the committee appointed to inquire whether it be expedient to make any amendment in the laws which regulate the coins of the United States, and foreign coins, were instructed to inquire, also, into the expediency of fixing the standard of weights and measures.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the sale of such military sites, owned by the United States, as have become, or have been found to be useless for military purposes.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill, explanatory of the act, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land titles, in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri," were discharged; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act making provision for the claim of M. de Poiré, and An act making provision for the claim of M. de Vienne, were severally read a third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of moneys paid to the army for extra labor upon roads and other objects of fatigue duty, for the year ending the 1st October, 1818, so far as the accounts have been received including the extra issues of whiskey, rendered in pursuance of the resolutions of this House, of the 6th and 7th instant; which was ordered to lie on the table.

TERRITORIAL ORDINANCE.

Mr. SERGEANT offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of enacting a general ordinance, whereby the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty shall be guaranteed to the inhabitants of the Territories exterior to the original limits of the United States, and made the basis of all Governments hereafter to be established therein.

Mr. LOWMEDE said, that the resolution was rather obscure in its terms, so that its scope was not easily understood. He thought, however, he could perceive what the object of it was. He wished, however, that it might be permitted to lie on the table for the present, to give an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. SERGEANT said he had no objection to the resolution's lying on the table for the present, if any gentleman desired it. With respect to the allusion of the gentleman to the object of it, Mr. S. said the gentleman was right. He had a particular object in view, which he did not mean to have concealed from the House, but which he did not think it necessary to express more distinctly than he had done in the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to lie upon the table.

INSTIGATING INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of punishing as spies white men who may be found instigating the Indians to hostilities, or fighting with them, against the United States.

Mr. STORRS objected to this resolution, that it presented a question, to be settled by the law of nations, and not by Congress. It would be a proper question to be settled in a Congress where all the nations of the earth were represented, but it was one not to be taken into consideration here.

Our rules and articles of war prescribed the mode of trial of spies, and that was the only way in which Congress could legislate on the subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL said, his object was to institute an inquiry into the propriety of the punishment of white men found fighting with the Indians. It was well known that two men—he knew not what countrymen to call them—Arbuthnot and Ambrister by name, had been considered as outlaws, being found in that situation. On this subject he would not express an opinion; but it was necessary, even if he were an Indian, that every person accused of crime should have some sort of a trial. His sole object was to institute an inquiry into the subject.

Mr. MILLS said, it was very seldom that he should desire to arrest the progress of any proposition for inquiry into any matter; but this motion embraced a question, respecting which no inquiry could be necessary. In addition to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, he stated another objection: if we pass it, said he, we could not object to other Governments, the British, Spanish, &c., legislating on the subject. It was well known that, in our wars with Great Britain, we had employed Indians on our side. This legislation would, to use a vulgar adage, be a game that two can play at, and we might, by passing laws on this matter, subject ourselves to a species of retaliation which would not be at all agreeable.

Mr. NELSON said, he considered this question as already before the House; as, on hearing it stated, the case of General Jackson occurs to every man. Under that question, the power of the Government and the law of nations on this subject, would be fully discussed. To adopt the proposition now before the House, would be, in fact, to pronounce an opinion without inquiry. He was, therefore, opposed to the resolution, because its adoption would be to pre-judge a case prepared and set apart for discussion.

On the question being taken, the resolution was negatived by a large majority.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Mr. HARRISON's bill to provide for the organization and discipline of the militia.

Mr. BASSETT moved an amendment, as a substitute to the bill, which consisted of upwards of twenty sections, embracing a system different from that of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON delivered a speech of considerable length, in support of the bill, and on the importance of Congress acting on the subject.

Mr. SIMKINS said that the present thinness of the House admonished him that this, although a most important, was not a favorite subject, with this body. He agreed with the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. HARRISON,) that whenever banks were brought up, or even private claims, in some instances, the undivided attention of the House was given, and when General Jackson and the Seminole war were broached, there was a silence as profound as if the very breaths of members were suspended; while upon this one, the most important of all subjects, there could be but little attention attracted. This might arise from a constant effort, for a series of years, without any success, in framing an efficient system for the due organization of those who must be relied upon to fight the battles of the country. But, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the House, said Mr. S., whether the difficulty of the subject is any reason why it should not be at last effected, provided it is of that immense and indispensable importance for which I contend.

Will the House think it amiss, said he, if I call back their attention to the situation of the country at the commencement of the last war? After the Revolutionary war, our citizens had got so completely immersed in commerce, agriculture, and everything else, except a due organization of the militia, and keeping alive that spirit so essential in a republic, that this military spirit and military knowledge were nearly extinct. What were the consequences? They were written in characters of blood in every encounter with the enemy in the fight of the late war, and the innocent blood then spilt, and treasure wasted, would be, it would seem, sufficient to impress upon this, and all future Congresses, a solemn admonitory lesson as to the necessity of an efficient militia.

The Secretary of War was required, by a resolution of this House, at its last session, to report the number, state, and strength of the militia of the several States—and what was the result? Why, that several of the States could not give an account of even their numbers! So great is the lethargy, and fatal, I fear, will be the consequences of this indifference.

Many honorable members of this House seem to be so much opposed to, and jealous of standing armies, that they will hardly vote money for the due organization and efficient regulation of our small one. Yes, this jealousy seemed to exist, to our small though brave army, nominally of 10,000, though not more than 6 or 7,000 men, stationed at the numerous forts, and scattered over a territory of two or three thousand miles of seacoast, and from two to three thousand miles in breadth. How then can it be reconciled that those members, so jealous of a standing army, are not among the first to give us an efficient militia? They are not the first in the ranks to give us that well regulated, armed, and organized militia, which not only renders a standing army unnecessary, but, I hesitate not to say, which must be the strength and defence of this great and rising Republic—the basis upon which the liberties of this happy people must rest. A due cultivation, Mr. Chairman, of this military spirit and knowledge diffused among the people will, as the gentleman from Ohio has said, oppose, more strongly than anything else, that influx of riches and luxury which more than anything else threatens to enervate us, and overwhelm and overthrow the fair fabric of our liberties.

Can we, then, Mr. Chairman said Mr. S., justly feel disinclined to the great work contemplated in the present bill, seeing that the common defence of the country is emphatically made our duty by that Constitution which we have all sworn to support? In vain has this sacred instrument not only given us the liberty, but made it our solemn duty to provide for the common defence, for calling out, arming, and disciplining the militia, if it is never to be attended to. Although I do not like the bill of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BASSETT) so well as that now before the House, and introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, because it seems to me to possess more difficult complication in its classification; yet, there are features in both of which I am extremely fond. They, in the first place, provide an uniform system, a matter of great importance; they next provide for calling out the militia by the President of the United States, when public exigency may require. In the third place, they enable the President, by the militia, effectually to repel invasion, not by halting at the precise line of the United States, as they most injuriously and fatally did during the last war, upon the borders of Canada, but repelling it, by compelling them, under exemplary fines and forfeitures, to follow the enemy into other countries, until a due and disabling chastisement was inflicted. Another and a fourth great object, contemplated by both bills, is to put arms, under due regulations, into the hands of such class of the militia as from youth and other circumstances may be best calculated to defend our country.

There is one feature in the bill, introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, which I would wish to see introduced, if it can be constitutionally done, into the bill now before the House. It is that part which contemplates the encampment, disciplining, and training of a certain class of the militia, for a certain number of days in each year, and at the expense of the United States. It is denied by some that the Constitution gives this power. Although I am unskilled in construing this instrument, yet, I can hardly believe that the Constitution which gives us the power of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and governing them while in the United States service, could have been intended to deprive us of the power, a concurrent power with the States, so to discipline or train them as to make them fit for duty. However, without entering minutely into the Constitutional question, I conjure Congress to go as far towards the great object proposed, as may be clearly consistent with the Constitution. If we cannot make a system, even approaching to perfection, let us do all we can. Let us not legislate upon many other things, and leave untouched our greatest duty. Let us not follow the shadow, utterly disregarding of the substance.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. S., I am no military man, and sorry I am that I cannot afford assistance on the details of the bill. I rose principally to draw the attention of Congress, if I could, to this hackneyed but interesting duty. I am not vain enough to believe I have fully, if at all, succeeded. I cannot, however, take my seat without bringing again to the attention of the members of this Congress, that if it is intended to preserve to future ages our liberties, commit the defence of our country to a class of young men inspired by the spirit of liberty and trained to military duty. Dispersed over the whole Union, they will be identified with its habits and interests, will be free from all the vicious habits and corruptions of a standing army, and will forever remain the sure basis of your freedom. In speaking freely of the indifference which seemed to me to pervade this House on this subject, I attack the motives of no member. My views may be the dictate of a mistaken zeal or enthusiasm, essaying to do what may be impracticable. If so, I shall at least have the great consolation of having done, as far as I could, my duty, not only to my immediate constituents, but to the nation at large.

Mr. BASSETT then spoke at some length in support of his amendment.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. BASSETT spoke alternately twice or thrice, in support of their respective opinions.

The question was at length taken on Mr. BASSETT's proposed amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. HARRISON then suggesting that he had several amendments to offer to the bill, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16.

The Committee on Foreign Relations was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the New York Society, for promoting the manumission of slaves, and protecting such of them as have been, or may be, liberated; and it was referred to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade.

Mr. FENDALL, from the committee appointed yesterday, reported a bill to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act explanatory of the act, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri;" and An act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to authorize and empower the President and Managers of the Washington Turnpike Company, of the State of Maryland, when organized, to extend and make their turnpike road to or from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, through the said District to the line thereof;" were severally read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the resolution "for the distribution of Seybert's Statistical Annals, and directing Pitkin's Commercial Statistics to be deposited in the Library," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The said amendment was read and concurred in by the House.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the committee appointed on the 30th of November last, to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, to report thereon, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not, made a detailed report thereon; which was read and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The report is as follows:

The committee appointed to inspect the books, and to examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, with directions to report thereon, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not, respectfully report—

That, under the leave granted by the House, the committee repaired to Philadelphia, and there personally inspected the books of the bank; and, as a further means of examining its proceedings, they interrogated, on oath, the president, the cashier, all the directors of the bank whose attendance could be obtained, and several of its clerks and officers. Examinations also have been made at the offices at Baltimore, at Richmond, and at the City of Washington, in order to obtain specific information upon certain subjects on which the books of the parent bank were necessarily deficient. From these inquiries, conducted with great labor, and the committee trust with great care, they have collected a mass of information which they now submit to the House, and which will be referred to in the course of this report. This information consists of tables, statements, and extracts made by the committee from the books of the bank, or by them compared with those books and verified; and of the testimony of witnesses, and of letters from the president of the institution.

The committee are aware that, from these sources of information, various important inferences may be drawn, and upon them the most interesting opinions may be predicated; it has been their intention, however, to go no further than was required by the resolution of the House; to avoid speculative opinions on general subjects; and to confine themselves to what they deemed practical objects of inquiry, which they settled among themselves previous to entering upon the investigation. These objects seemed to divide themselves into two classes: those which related to the general management of the bank, and the conduct of its officers, and those which were connected with the question of a violation of its charter. As to the general management of the concerns of the institution, among the points of inquiry which appeared to be most immediately interesting, were those which related to the refusal of the bank and its offices to pay its notes in specie at any other place than that where they were made payable, and to the practice of selling drafts on each other.

It appears that the directors of the bank, on its first institution, and up to the 28th of August, 1818, strenuously endeavored to redeem its notes at all its offices, indiscriminately, north of the city of Charleston. On the 7th day of January, 1817, it commenced operations by discounting notes on pledged stock, and to stockholders only, and by the issue of its bills. The officer then at the head of the Treasury Department had repeatedly urged the commencement of operations, with the laudable view, as it appears, of hastening the redemption, by the State banks, of their notes in specie. Vide letters from the Secretary of the Treasury to the president of the Bank of the United States, 15th August and 29th November, 1816, marked I. II.

Efforts on the part of the Treasury to induce the local banks to that measure, appear to have been abortive, until the Bank of the United States made certain propositions which induced negotiations between it and the State institutions, which finally resulted in a compact contained in the resolutions of the board of directors of the 31st January, 1817, herewith submitted, and marked III.; and in order to exhibit how far the bank complied with its compact, a statement of the loans made and of notes issued up to the 20th February, 1817, is submitted, marked IV. It can be necessary only to refer to the state of the paper currency of the country at this period. The notes of the State banks were variously depreciated—some as much as twenty per cent, while others were at a premium. The excessive issue of paper by the local banks had caused an unnatural and artificial depreciation of such paper, which required only time, and moderate but steady reductions to restore, not to a uniform par, but to its true value. Under these circumstances the Bank of the United States had, on the last of February, 1817, (vide statement marked V.), $8,848,000 due to it from the State banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore. With such a credit constantly accumulating by the transfer of the Treasury funds, and by the payment of the second instalment in the notes of the State banks, it was in the power of the United States Bank to have coerced the local institutions into a moderate and reasonable reduction of their circulating notes. An attempt to do so was made by the compact, III.; and, although the Bank of the United States appears to have been anxious to effect the object, it did not persevere in this design. By its subsequent acts it improvidently afforded a temptation, to the Western banks particularly, to extend their circulation of notes, by insisting on its branches paying out their own notes in preference to those of the State banks; and on their delivering drafts on the eastern cities, whenever it could be done, to prevent the remittance of their own notes. The branch notes, and the drafts issued in consequence of these instructions, were swept away by the facility of remittance thus unwarily given, as well as by the ordinary balance of trade. A vacuum in the circulation was thus produced, which could be supplied only by the local notes, which were readily received by the offices of the Bank of the United States, and were retained by them as a fund upon which interest was charged to the State banks. The letter of the president, marked VI., exhibits the course pursued by the bank in this respect.

The Bank of the United States received from the Treasury the notes of the local institutions, in many cases as special deposits, to be paid out in similar bills. From April, 1817, to this time, the amount so received appears, from statement VII., to be $2,752,750, of which $87,331 continues on hand, leaving $2,665,409 as the amount voluntarily assumed by the Bank of the United States. The committee have not found any evidence of the bank having attempted to oppress the State banks, either by wanton demands of specie, or by the rejection of their notes. Much complaint has indeed existed, but in the instances which have come to the knowledge of the committee, the State banks have been in the wrong, and some of them at the westward have refused the most equitable propositions of the bank, and have met its demands for its just dues with complaints and reproaches. It was not intended to trouble the House with any of the various letters which have passed on that subject, but as the president of the bank transmitted a letter from the office at Charleston, exhibiting the conduct of the local banks in that place, it is presented to the House, marked VIII.

The committee are of opinion that, instead of conducting with the alleged rigor towards the State banks, the Bank of the United States is liable to the more serious charge of having increased the amount of notes in circulation, by its acceptance of them in those places where it was known they would not be redeemed in specie, and by making them, in the manner before-mentioned, the only circulating medium in that part of the country. The forbearance of the bank towards the State banks is vindicated on the ground of its being the only means to induce the resumption of specie payments. This effect, if really owing to that cause, has been proved to be but temporary, and experience has shown that at the same time, or soon after the refusal of the Bank of the United States to receive the notes of its offices, many of the State banks began to suspend and evade their specie payments.

So long as the notes of each office were payable at all the others, and the office issuing them was not exclusively liable for their redemption, the discounts at those places, against which there was a balance of trade, became larger in proportion to their indemnity against demands. As the notes of the offices were rapidly carried off, the payment of these discounts were necessarily made in the notes of the local institutions; and thus it was one inevitable effect of the old system to increase the debts of the State banks to the offices of the Bank of the United States at these places. The demands of the bank were suffered to accumulate improperly, instead of being gradually reduced as specie was required at other offices, and in small quantities that would not have been felt. Their reduction was not insisted upon sufficiently early; and, when the bank began to call for specie, its demands were so considerable as not only to expose the local banks, but the citizens in their vicinity, generally, to very severe pressure.

By substituting the credit of individuals for the payment of the second instalment, which will be presently stated, instead of coin or notes of State banks, the Bank of the United States in a great measure deprived itself of the early and prompt check which the possession of those notes would have afforded, to the more extensive increase of local paper. In July, 1817, the debts due from the State banks were reduced to $3,972,000, while the notes of the Bank of the United States, in circulation, amounted to $4,754,000; by which it might have been subjected to embarrassments arising from the calls of the local institutions. The committee think it evident, from this result, that the bank did not exercise, with sufficient energy, the power which it possessed, and might have retained, but rather afforded inducements to the State banks to extend the amount of their circulating notes, and thus increased one of the evils it was intended to correct.

In answer to an inquiry addressed by the committee on this subject to the president of the bank, they were furnished with his views, and a letter from the office at Boston, marked LX, and were referred to a report of the committee of directors on the 28th of August, 1818, marked X. These documents exhibit the reasons of the bank for adopting the resolutions of that date, by which the notes of the offices were refused acceptance. In the letter of the Boston office much stress is placed upon the large accumulation of paper and drafts at Boston, issued by the Southern and Western offices. And this became an important object of inquiry. The books of the parent bank do not furnish information respecting the drafts made by, and upon, the offices, excepting those which were made on it. And the committee have not ascertained their amount, except at the offices in Baltimore and this city. From the local situation of Baltimore, the statements obtained at that office, marked XI, XII, may be considered as furnishing sufficient proof of the correctness of the opinion expressed by the Boston office. To the office at Boston, its debt fluctuated between $34,000 and $215,000, until May last, since which it has been indebted to Baltimore $500 to $57,000. Its debt to the office at New York has varied from $100,000 to $1,947,000, and, until October last, it has generally owed that office more than $1,500,000. At that time the New York office was brought in debt to Baltimore $47,278; its debt in November last was $10,948. The explanation of these extraordinary reductions of the Baltimore debts is given from the circumstances: Treasury drafts on the North being delivered directly to the Baltimore office, or sent to it through the office at this city; and by a check on New York for more than a million, given by the parent bank in payment of foreign bills of exchange, hereinafter mentioned. The Baltimore debt to the parent bank has varied from $1,500,000 to $9,000,000, and has generally exceeded $6,000,000. Notwithstanding their heavy debts to New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, the drafts of the Baltimore office on those places continued uninterrupted, and excessive in amount; that office was originally supplied with notes to the amount of $872,000, and had returned to it from Philadelphia $1,697,000, in its notes, and yet it is stated by the teller, that it never had a sufficient quantity of notes to meet its demands; that they did not remain twenty-four hours in the office, but were constantly remitted to the North with the drafts which it issued. And there can be no doubt, on a comparison of the statements referred to, connected with these facts, that the drafts from Baltimore, given for the proceeds of notes discounted, were unwarrantably large, and much more than the balance of trade required.

In a letter of the president, dated June 27, 1817, he observes, "the directors considering (among other things) the low state of the specie and individual deposits at your office, and the magnitude of your discounts and those at this bank, as well for Baltimore as this place, and the very inadequate and disproportioned amount of discounts to which the office at New York has been restricted in consequence of the daily and excessive drafts from your office and this bank, which has become the subject of just animadversion," direct that the then amount of discounts should not be exceeded. The same language is held in other letters, (XIII, XIV,) but it terminated in unavailing remonstrances; the Baltimore office continued its drafts and its discounts, and drained the specie from the Northern offices. And such was the want of firmness or of foresight in the parent board, that, after finding its repeated remonstrances disregarded, it never removed one of the offending directors, and took no effectual step to control them, until the adoption of the general resolutions of August 28, 1818, forbidding the offices to draw on each other. The effect of these excessive drafts on the Northern offices was to compel the constant remittance of specie there to cripple them in all their operations, to limit their discounts to a trifling amount, to cause the revenue paid there, and which would itself have been a capital for business, to be drawn Southward, thus compelling them to deny to the debtors of the Government any indulgence or accommodation in their payments; to bring those offices into debt with the State banks, to produce a general depression of credit, and a severe pressure for money. Those places were, in fact, made tributary to Baltimore; and all their means and energies were required to supply its extravagant issues.

A sudden reduction of the Baltimore debt to the Northern offices appears to have taken place in March and April last, and within a few months past those offices have been brought in debt to it. This is accounted for by the cashier of that office, by saying that it arose principally from Treasury drafts, and by the sale of foreign bills of exchange. Drafts were given in some instances, and to considerable amounts, directly to Baltimore on the Northern offices, and, in other instances, such drafts went through the office in this city. It is not to be presumed that these drafts were given by the Treasury with a knowledge of all the circumstances, or with a view to draw the revenue collected at the North to Baltimore, merely to aid that office in paying its debts. Yet such was the effect, and, although it enabled Baltimore to continue its large discounts, it impoverished the Northern offices, and the cities where they were established were made to feel the pressure. The Baltimore debt to the parent bank will be found to have regularly increased with the reduction of its debts to the other offices, until it remitted $1,007,000 in bills of exchange on London; which remittance is connected, by the testimony of J. W. McCulloch, Esq., with the negotiation explained in the letter of the president, XV. The loan which resulted from that negotiation was on pledge of stock that had been pledged at Baltimore; the bank assumed it and received the bills of exchange, and paid for them, by giving a check on the New York office for the amount, at the time the Baltimore office was indebted to the parent bank more than $6,000,000.

It might have been supposed that the pressure of the Baltimore office upon those more north, was owing to its being pressed by the Southern and Western offices. The fact will however appear from the table XI, that until September last it was indebted to the office at Lexington, that the debts of Cincinnati, Chillicothe, and Louisville to it were small in amount, and that the only office which has constantly owed it is New Orleans, and that office not to a large amount until lately.

From these facts it would seem to result that the embarrassments of the Bank of the United States, in receiving the notes of all its offices, did not arise so much from the fair and ordinary balance of trade, which might have been calculated and provided for, as from the excessive discounts granted at some of the offices, particularly Baltimore and Philadelphia, and the drafts consequent upon those discounts which were made upon the other offices. From the correspondence of the bank with its offices, it is obvious that this was the opinion of the directors and the officers; it is distinctly assigned as one of the grounds for refusing the notes of the offices in the report of the committee, X, and it is more strongly urged in the letter of the Boston office, submitted and adopted by the president, IX, and is eloquently enforced in several of his letters.

This committee is not prepared to say that an uniformly equal currency could have been maintained under the most auspicious circumstances; they are inclined to the opinion that such an attempt would be hopeless, but they consider its abandonment at the time as having been produced by the causes before stated. The efforts of the bank to meet the payment of its notes at all its offices north of Charleston, were certainly great, and particularly at New York and Boston, as will appear from the resolutions marked XVI, and the account of specie remitted XVII. The relinquishment of the attempt was involuntary and reluctant.

From the testimony of the cashier and tellers of the bank, the teller of the Bank of North America, and of the cashier and teller of the office at Baltimore, it will appear, very satisfactorily, that the conduct of the bank and that office in adopting the new system of refusing the notes of the branches, was perfectly fair and equitable; that the bank and the Baltimore office promptly paid and received all the notes of the other offices which had paid out previous to the change of the system, whenever application was made for the purpose, and that in no instance have they refused to do so. Injury probably was suffered by those who had received the depreciated notes in the usual course of business, but the committee cannot perceive how the bank could have changed its system in any manner less injurious to itself and less inconvenient to the public than that which was adopted.

From this change of system, which placed the notes of the offices on the same footing with those of the local banks in their vicinity, resulted a greater difference in the exchange between the different parts of the Union. The offices at New Orleans, Savannah, and Charleston, had never been included in the plan of equalizing the currency. They had always been left to their own discretion in receiving or refusing the notes of the other offices. In May, 1817, the offices at Charleston and Savannah were authorized to draw on those at the North at a premium. In April, those at Lexington and Cincinnati were authorized to purchase bills on the Eastern and Northern cities. In December, 1817, the Southern offices were authorized to draw at a premium on those at the North. In October and November, 1817, the Western offices were authorized to draw at a premium on Philadelphia and the offices south of it; and it appears that the offices at Lexington and Cincinnati, before February, 1818, were in the practice of drawing on the Eastern cities. These facts show that the bank, and most of the offices, sold drafts upon each other long before the adoption of the resolution of the 28th of August, 1818, refusing the notes of the offices; and establish that, while the bank was attempting to equalize the currency, by the payment of its notes at all its offices north of Charleston, it was at the same time selling drafts between those offices at a premium. A system of domestic exchange was adopted by the bank on the 18th of July, 1817, marked XVIII. It contains some provisions which appear exceptionable; but as the plan never was acted upon, it is not deemed necessary to notice them. It has been impracticable for the committee to ascertain the amount, or the rates of the drafts, sold by and upon the offices. On examination of the books of the parent bank, it appears that drafts were sold by it on Charleston, New Orleans, and Savannah, within a few days of each other, at very different rates; on one day at one per cent., and on another day at five per cent. on the same office. It would be in vain to attempt to account for these fluctuations.

However dangerous to the community may be the power of selling drafts, in the hands of an institution whose resources may be adequate to the control of domestic exchange, according to its interest or caprice, yet the committee cannot entertain a doubt that the bank possesses the power. Excepting the fluctuations before noticed, the rate of premium has not hitherto been extortionate, in any instance which came to the knowledge of the committee. The proceedings of the bank and its officers, and the reasons and views entertained by them, are exhibited in the report XVIII, in the letter of the president XIX, and in the extracts from the correspondence XX.

Various opinions are entertained on the expediency of the bank's selling drafts. While many suppose that it would consult its own dignity and interest, in refraining from the practice, and would receive an equivalent for the loss of premium in the confidence and support of the commercial community, by delivering its drafts gratuitously, when it was convenient to draw at all; others contend that the system of gratuitous drafts would open an avenue to favoritism, and, at all events, would expose the bank to the charge in a greater degree than if it sold its drafts. Without expressing any opinion upon these subjects, upon which the community is much divided, and to which the attention of the committee has not been particularly directed, they content themselves with observing, that if drafts are sold, they ought to be at fixed, known, and permanent prices, not exceeding the expense of transportation of specie, on the fair agio of business: the want of these fixed prices in the bank and its offices, appears to your committee censurable.

Connected with the subject of exchange, is that of dealing in the notes of the State banks. In a letter of the President to the Charleston office, which had received the sanction of the board of directors, marked XXI, an opinion in favor of the legality and propriety of such purchases is expressed. No evidence, however, has been obtained, that they have actually been made. The practice, in the opinion of the committee, would be highly improper and dangerous, and contrary to the spirit, if not the words of the 9th fundamental article.

Among the resolutions of the directors, are two on the subject of discounts, on a pledge of stock, marked XXII and XXIII, passed the 18th and 27th December, 1816. These resolutions obviously contemplate only discounts to the stockholders, and one avowed object was to facilitate the payment of the specie part of the second instalment, which was ten dollars on a share, and to be paid by the 23d, January, 1817. The loans were to be confined to the proportions of the coin part of the second instalment, on the shares which had been subscribed at the places where offices were then in operation—New York, Boston, and Baltimore. The total amount of these loans to pay the specie part of the said instalment on the 20th of February, 1817, at Phil-

Philadelphia, was $199,921 37, and at Baltimore, at that date, was $138,320 00.

The committee have not obtained information of the amount at New York and Boston, but they are informed by the officers of the bank, that the discounts at those places were to a very trifling amount, if any. The committee can see no reason to justify these premature efforts, to aid the payment of the second instalment, before it fell due, and before the experiment was made to ascertain how much could be paid in specie. Those efforts do not appear to have been very successful; for $839,085 only were paid during the month of January, 1817, while $1,078,319 was paid after that period, the greatest proportion in May and June, as will appear from an abstract prepared by the committee, and now submitted, marked XXIV.

The amount paid by checks, also, appears from that abstract, the most, if not the whole, of which were to draw the proceeds of notes discounted for the purpose. And it appears, that in many instances, particularly in one related in Mr. McEuen's testimony, hereinafter referred to, and in another referred to in the President's letter of May 27th, 1817, marked XXV, that the directors did not confine themselves to the amount prescribed in the resolution of the 27th December, that is to the proportion of the coin part of the second instalment, but discounted to the full value of the stock, which was paid for by the proceeds of the same discounts; and the discount, the payment of the second instalment, the payment of the price to the owner, the transfer and the pledge of the stock, were, as it is termed, simultaneous acts. All the discounts on stock, after the 20th February, 1817, were made at the par value of the shares, which enabled the discounters not only to pay the whole of his instalments, including the specie part, and the funded debt part, but also to draw out of the bank the amount which might have been paid in on his shares. It is alleged, in justification of those discounts, that specie bore a very high premium, and that the bank could not have commenced business, unless that mode of obtaining the specie payment had been adopted. With respect to the price of specie, it appears to have been six per cent. at Philadelphia, on the 6th January 1817, and about the same price at Baltimore; and that it had been much higher. Admitting, however, that the price would have been much enhanced, in consequence of its being understood that the coin payment on the second instalment would be rigidly exacted, yet the committee cannot perceive the justice of enabling some of the stockholders to evade that payment, and the consequent loss of the premium on specie, while the majority had been compelled to incur the same loss, in order, strictly, to comply with the law and their engagements; particularly unjust was it to those who resided at such a distance from the bank that they could not avail themselves of the privilege granted. And the injustice appears the greater, when it is known, that the expense of the specie afterwards imported by the bank, in order to supply the deficiency produced by the evasion it had authorized, was assessed equally upon those stockholders who had neglected to pay, upon those who had already, at considerable loss, furnished their quota of coin, and upon the Government. Seven millions was the whole sum required to be paid in coin—the specie part of the first instalment, amounting to $1,400,000 was paid; of the $2,800,000, which was to have been paid at the second instalment, it is impossible to say what amount was actually paid in coin.

The statement before referred to, marked XXIV, will show the payments in coin at Philadelphia; and abstract marked XXVI, will exhibit the nominal payments on all the instalments, of which $13,872,610 was paid by the stockholders in funded debt, (exclusive of the $7,000,000 subscribed by the Government,) instead of $21,000,000 which were required by the law; and $14,100,167 was paid, as stated in the abstract, in coin. But, in that abstract, a check on the bank, or on other banks supposed to pay specie, is deemed a payment in coin; and as the payments on the second instalment continued to be made and received for six months and more, after it was due, and as, during that time, large discounts on stocks were constantly made, it is obvious that the abstract cannot be relied on as exhibiting an actual amount paid in specie. Nor, on the other hand, could the whole amount of the discounts on stock be considered as having been applied to the payment of the second instalment. By statement marked (B) referred to in the cashier's answer, and by this committee marked XXVII, it appears that the discounts on the 30th July, 1817, on pledged stock, amounted to $8,046,932: of this amount, a part was applied to the payment of the third instalment, and a part was drawn out of the bank by the discounters. A large portion of it, is believed, however, to have been used to pay the second instalment. Of the $2,800,000, which was to have been paid at the third instalment, it is believed that a very trifling amount was paid in coin, and as little of the funded debt, but that nearly the whole of both was paid by the proceeds of notes discounted on the pledge of stock. The total amount of specie imported from Europe by the bank, since its institution to this time, appears, by statement marked XXVIII, to be $7,311,750 53, the expense of which, including interest, premium, and $20,000 paid to the agent for going to London, amounts to $525,297 38. The contract made for a part of that specie, and the authority to Mr. Sergeant, the agent, are submitted, marked XXIX, XXX. To the reasons urged by the officers of the bank, that such was the scarcity of specie, that it could not have been obtained, and that, without facilitating the payments by making discounts, the bank could not have gone into operation—the committee observe that they are at a loss to perceive how the simple act of discounting could make the specie more plenty; that, if it was not actually in the bank at the time of making those discounts, the checks of the discounters could not be considered as equivalent to specie.

The amount of specie in the Bank of the United States, in January, 1817, was $1,724,109—$324,000 more than the coin part of the first instalment, and which may fairly be presumed to have been received for the second instalment. If then the checks of stockholders founded upon discounts were equivalent to specie, they were by them authorized to draw out of the bank the very coin which had been paid in by other stockholders, in order to pay it into the bank again, for their own benefit, and to complete the payment of the specie part of the second instalment—an operation of more potency in creating specie than was ever ascribed to the fabled finger of Midas. The general statement in February, 1817, shows that the total amount of bills discounted was $2,930,067—making an excess of $1,205,958 of discounts over the specie in the bank. From which it would result, that the checks for the proceeds of those discounts were not in all cases equivalent to specie. As to the difficulty of the bank going into operation without those discounts being made, to facilitate the payment of the second instalment, it is not perceived how that measure removed the difficulty; for it is obvious that it did not add a single cent to the specie in the vaults of the institution. What other difficulty than the want of specie the bank had to encounter is not known, as all other obstructions seem to have yielded almost without an effort.

The effect of these discounts was, very obviously, to enable those who had made large purchases to retain their stock without paying for it, and to derive a benefit from its probable advancement in price. Had the bank rigidly required the payment of the instalment, the large stockholders must have sold that portion of their shares which their real means did not enable them to hold; or, if the bank had not exacted the instalments, and had not afforded the means of substituting credit for payment, the stock would not have advanced materially in price, and the large holders of it would have had no inducement to retain it. In either event, a more equal diffusion of the shares would have been the consequence, and it would have reached the hands of solid capitalists, who would have held only what they could pay for. It is believed that the loss of the dividends, and the liability to pay interest on the instalments due, would have been sufficient to compel even the stockjobber to sell. Although if those discounts had not been made the immediate profits of the bank would not have been so large, yet it would not have had an unwieldy capital to manage: it could have proceeded gradually, growing with the growth and strengthening with the strength of the nation, as it emerged from the evils of the flood of paper issued by the local institutions. The bank could have felt its way, and increased its means with the increasing demands of the country. Such a cautious proceeding would have enabled it to render invaluable service in checking the issues of State banks, and bringing them to the alternative of avowed bankruptcy, or to the permanent resumption of specie payments. The evil of the country was the immense amount of bank notes and credits. The Bank of the United States increased it by its credits to stockholders. That course did indeed enable the directors to declare a large dividend, but that the apparent prosperity was temporary and fallacious, is demonstrated by the recent dividend of two and a half per cent.

It might have been supposed, as it has been urged, that the discounting on stock was the only means in the power of the bank to enforce the payment of the second instalment. It is believed that the engagement on the part of the stockholders could have been enforced without difficulty by the courts of law. Decisions to that effect have been made in the States of Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York. And when the stockholder's note was taken without an endorser or any other collateral security but the pledge of the stock, it is not perceived how his legal liability was increased. In the sale of the stock pledged there was indeed a prospect of indemnity, which depended however wholly on the price of shares in the market. The same circumstances that prevented the actual payment of the instalment would have interposed, it is presumed, to obstruct the liquidation of the note in lieu of it. And in the emergency which would have compelled the bank to reduce its discounts, it would most probably require a good price for the stock; and the very necessity of the times which would force an unusual quantity of it into the market, would probably defeat the object of security. In fact, a large part of the amount thus discounted was not paid at the maturity of the notes, (vide statement XXVII,) but was renewed. Of the still larger proportion which appears from that statement to have been paid, it is wholly impossible to determine what part was converted into notes, on personal security, or what part resumed the new shape which was given to notes discounted on pledged stock after the 20th February, 1817. It ought to be remarked that many persons, after finding the disposition of the board, obtained discounts, who were perfectly prepared to pay, and would have paid their instalments, if the inducements to credit had not been offered to them.

Had the bank resorted to its remedy through the courts to obtain the payment of the second instalment, it would probably have obtained something from the stockholders—it could have lost nothing—and at all events would have saved the dividends upon the delinquent stock. But by taking the note of the owner it admitted that the instalment was paid, and abandoned the means of coercion given by the charter in withholding the dividends, and obtained nothing. It did not increase the responsibility of the stockholder, while it exposed the bank to the certain loss of the dividends, and to the chance of loss if the stock should be forced into the market in large quantities.

The committee are of opinion that the resolutions, and the practice of discounting beforementioned, were incorrect; that they were particularly objectionable, from their partial operation in affording facilities to some stockholders, which could not be enjoyed by those at a distance. Even at Richmond, the stockholders made their payments for the second instalment in funded debt and in coin, which was probably purchased at a premium. The committee find it difficult to reconcile those resolutions with the views professed in their adoption, and are satisfied that they were connected intimately with other measures calculated to affect the price of stock, and particularly with discounts of a similar character, soon after made.

One of the acts, obviously intended to give the bank stock a high price in the European market, was the establishment of an agency there, to pay the dividends. On the 28th November, 1816, a resolution was passed, by the casting vote of the president, and against the report of a committee who had been appointed to consider the subject, authorizing John Sergeant, Esq, to make arrangements in Europe for the payment of the bank dividends, at the par of exchange, and at the risk and expense of the bank. Such an arrangement was made, by which it was stipulated to make the payments six months after the dividends were declared; the papers on this subject are marked XXXIX, XL, XLI. How far it was objectionable thus to offer inducements to foreigners to become interested in our stock, and semi-annually to withdraw from the country the amount of their dividends, the committee do not undertake to decide, as they consider it one of those general and abstract subjects to which the resolution of the House does not direct their attention. But, thus to compel American stockholders, and the Government, to contribute to the possible loss of paying the dividends to those abroad, appears unjust. The nearly equal division of the directors on this important subject, and the able reasons assigned in the report of the committee against the measure, ought at least to have prevented the precipitate adoption of the resolution. And when the committee find among the eleven who voted in the affirmative the names of directors who have been constantly and largely engaged in the purchase and sale of stock, and that of the ten who voted in the negative, not one has been ascertained to have dealt in those transactions, they are almost irresistibly impelled to the conclusion, that the measure was adopted more with a view to enhance the price of shares than for the permanent benefit of the institution.

The practice of discounting on stock, to the full amount paid upon the shares, appears to have commenced early at the parent bank, under the 4th by law, which is similar to the 15th regulation for the government of the offices, both of which were adopted at the commencement of the institution.

They authorize discounts without an endorser, on the stock of the bank, or the funded debt of the United States, or such other property as shall be approved when pledged to an amount sufficient to secure the payment of the notes. By a statement referred to in the cashier's examination, XXVII, it appears that the total amount of discounts on pledged stock, up to 30th July, 1817, was $8,046,932 64, of which there had been paid, at that time, $2,815,665 04; those loans, it is presumed, were made chiefly at Philadelphia, as the Baltimore loans on stock had not commenced to a large extent at that time. On the 25th July, 1817, a resolution, marked XXXI, was adopted, authorizing the officers to discount notes, secured by a pledge of bank stock or funded debt, with a recital, that it might be desirable to many persons to obtain temporary loans on such pledges, and a form of the pledge was directed to be transmitted; it is marked XXXII. These notes had no endorsers, and the discount was in fact made upon the credit of the stock. For by a resolution of the 30th September, 1817, marked XXXIII, the president and cashier were authorized, in all cases to renew these notes when they fell due between discount days, and by the resolution of November 6th, 1818, marked XXXIV, the president and cashier were authorized, in all cases, when required by the party, to substitute the note and hypothecation of the person to whom stock might be by transferred, and on which loans at par had been made.

By the resolution of 25th August, 1817, marked XXXV, discounts to stockholders were authorized, at one hundred and twenty-five dollars per share, upon presenting collateral security for the twenty-five dollars. The provision requiring an endorser, or collateral security for the excess, above the par value, was in many instances, and to very considerable amounts, effectually evaded, by some of the largest borrowers becoming endorsers for each other. The alleged reasons for the resolution are, that bank shares had been discounted upon, at one hundred and twenty dollars, by the local institutions in New York, and that it was necessary, in order to employ the capital which had been increased beyond the ordinary means of using it advantageously, by the redemption of eleven millions of the public debt. The practice of other banks would not, in the opinion of your committee, afford any justification of the measure; and, when that practice was to be urged as a reason, the directors ought at least to have been correctly informed of the fact. The committee addressed inquiries to the several banks in the city of New York, and, from their answers, it appears, that in two or three instances only, discounts have been made on the bank shares; that those notes never were renewed; and that in no instance has any bank there discounted on the shares of the Bank of the United States above their par value. And, although pains have been taken to ascertain the fact, no evidence has been discovered of any other bank having made discounts on stock above its par value.

The redemption of the eleven millions of public debt, was effected by the application of that amount of deposits to the credit of the Government, then in the vaults of the bank.

Much unfounded and unnecessary complaint appears to have been made by the officers of the bank against this very prudent measure. That it disappointed the expectations of those who calculated on receiving interest from the Government while they discounted on its money is very probable and very natural. And it is not surprising that some expedient should have been resorted to, in order to supply another equivalent source of profit. But there were other resources besides the stock of the bank. The Government stock was better security, and, although it was uniformly above par, the directors seem never to have thought of discounting upon it above its par value. They began by rating it at ninety dollars for every one hundred, while they were discounting on their own shares at par. By a resolution passed 20th May, 1817, marked XXXVII, the Government stock was rated at par; and soon after, bank shares were discounted upon at one hundred and twenty-five for every one hundred, with an endorser for the excess.

The committee are surprised to find so little good paper business done at the bank and its offices, where it was to have been reasonably expected that the merchants would have preferred transacting their business. The directors themselves avow that they uniformly gave a preference to stock notes over business paper; their reasons are contained in their examinations. But, when the complaint is, that the bank had more capital than it could employ, it is singular that any business paper should have been rejected. In July, 1817, that kind of paper, to the amount of about $940,000, and, in August, to the amount of about $493,500, was rejected at Philadelphia; and, at Baltimore, in July, about $407,000, and in August about $183,000, were rejected. These sums are not precisely accurate, but are sufficiently so for general views. Whether this paper was such as ought to have been rejected, the committee have no means of determining. The amounts rejected are probably not more than might be expected from a bank, doing business on such an extensive scale, at any other time than when it was anxious to employ its capital. Not an instance has occurred of a note secured by a pledge of stock being rejected.

On the 9th of January, 1817, the board resolved, (paper marked XXXVI,) from and after the 20th February then next, and to the 1st of July, to discount notes to those who should have revenue bonds to pay during that period. The amount done under that resolution was small, and it does not appear that such notes have, at any time, been discounted extensively.

The principal business of the bank certainly has been to discount on notes secured by a pledge of stock, under the various resolutions before recited. Their effect was to abandon all personal security, and to rely entirely on the stock pledged—a system which, your committee think, need only to be stated to insure unqualified reprehension. Besides the objection which arises from these loans being in their nature perpetual, after all personal security was abandoned, it appears to have been an act of selfimmolation, thus to place beyond the reach of the institution, in the event of an emergency, to which it and all others are liable, so large a portion of its loans. On the 20th October last, a statement was made, exhibiting the amounts discounted on notes secured by a pledge of the bank stock, and then remaining unpaid, at the following places: at Philadelphia, $4,680,800, of which $173,450 was above the par value; at Baltimore, $2,402,435, of which it cannot be ascertained what proportion was above the par value, but it is believed to have exceeded $500,000; at Charleston, $897,429, of which $2,000 was above par; at Washington, $298,570, of which but a small amount was above par; at Richmond, $209,840, and none above par. There are no accounts from the other offices, the directors having required statements only from those whose discounts on stock exceeded $100,000. A statement has been furnished by the bank of the amount discounted at the above places, and remaining unpaid at this time, marked XLII, which differs somewhat, but not materially, from the statement in October last; by that statement, the total amount of discounts at the bank and at those offices, on pledged stock, is $8,022,954; and, by the general statement on the 1st December last, the total amount of such discounts, at the bank and all its offices, is $8,934,712; the difference between which sums is the amount discounted at all the other offices not above enumerated. The committee have compiled a statement (XLIII,) which exhibits, among other things, the total amount of discounts at the bank and all its offices, at different periods, on personal security and on pledged stock, from which it will appear that the largest amount discounted on bank stock was in January and February, 1818, when it was $11,244,514.

From this recital it will be apparent how large a portion of the capital of the bank was thus placed beyond its control. Although there have been some fluctuations in the amounts of those discounts at different periods, yet the greatest part of them, indeed the whole, with but few exceptions, have been constantly renewed from time to time, as the notes fell due, in many cases at four and six months. Indeed every subsequent act of the bank has been wholly at war with the profession of these loans being temporary, held out in the recital of the resolution of the 25th July, marked XXXI, and, in order to insure the greatest amount of such loans, and at the same time afford facilities to the prompt purchase and sale of stock, the directors, on the 8th August, 1817, passed a general resolution, authorizing the president and cashier to discount all stock notes that should be offered between discount days, to a certain amount; and, by various resolutions, adopted at different meetings until 7th September, appropriated $2,000,000 to their disposal for that purpose. The papers referred to are marked XLIV. And on the 30th September, 1817, the resolution already referred to, marked XXXIII, passed, authorizing those officers, in all cases, to renew the stock notes as they fell due between discount days.

Another, and probably much more censurable effect of these various resolutions and proceedings was, to keep the price of the stock constantly advancing, until it reached a point where it exploded and fell. From various sources of information, the committee have compiled a table of the prices of stock, at the different periods, which these resolutions were adopted, marked XLV, from which their effect in enhancing the price of shares is very clearly exhibited. It will appear, from that table, that the price of shares at Philadelphia on the 20th of August, 1817, was, according to the public reports, $147 50; according to the testimony of Mr. McEuen, a broker, it was $144; at the same place on the 30th of the same month, the price was $156 50. The resolution, authorizing discounts on stock, at $125, was passed on the 25th of the same month, vide XXXV. These facts would, in the opinion of your committee, be sufficient to condemn a system, which thus enabled a stockjobber to sport with the property of others. Stockjobbing, to an immense extent, and wagers on the price of shares, were its inevitable consequences. It gave equal facilities to the bankrupt, who had not credit enough to obtain an endorser, and to the capitalist. Stock could be, and was purchased, without the advance of a cent, by the purchaser, who had only to apply to the directors, or to the president and cashier, between discount days, for a loan on the shares about to be bought, and, by what is termed a simultaneous operation, he obtained his discount, and with it paid for his stock. A rise in the market would enable him to sell his shares, pocket the difference, and commence operations anew. And the committee are compelled to state, that, in fact, the largest loans on pledged stock were made to brokers, and to individuals, who appear to have been constantly in market. Loans on stock, at a rate below its par value, may, unquestionably, be useful to the merchant, who would avoid the obligation imposed by requiring an endorser, and would be highly beneficial to the bank, when restrained within moderate limits, and not made permanent.

But the loans actually made were most of them unreasonable and excessive in their amount; they were not made to the merchant and trader, but to a few persons consisting of directors, brokers, and speculators; and have been renewed and continued, almost invariably, at the option of the borrower. And when, in July last, the board decided a curtailment of its discounts, it fell in almost all cases upon the business paper, while the immense amounts loaned on stock pledges were but little affected, excepting at the offices at Richmond and Washington, where the curtailment appear to have fallen equally on all notes.
